

HC 4W6Z K

A FRONTIER DOCTOR

HENRY F. HOYT

BOSTONIENSIS

BIBLIOTHECA

MEDICINAE

SERVAT ET DOCEAT

FVNDATA

EX DONO

MDCCCLXXI

G. H. Monks, M. D.

A FRONTIER DOCTOR

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2025

Henry F. Hoyt.

A FRONTIER DOCTOR

BY e
HENRY F. HOYT

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY
FRANK B. KELLOGG

And with Illustrations

BOSTON AND NEW YORK
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY
The Riverside Press Cambridge
1929

COPYRIGHT, 1929, BY HENRY F. HOYT

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED INCLUDING THE RIGHT TO REPRODUCE
THIS BOOK OR PARTS THEREOF IN ANY FORM

26255

1. Ea. 723

The Riverside Press
CAMBRIDGE · MASSACHUSETTS PRINTED IN THE U.S.A.

This book is dedicated to the Old-Timers of the Panhandle and to my comrades of the Spanish-American War and the Filipino Insurrection.

PREFACE

IF you decide to go any further than this preface, you will soon perceive that my cards are all on the table face up. In my recital of experiences and adventures of my pioneering days, I have stuck to the truth. I have tried to demonstrate that a young man can travel along the different highways — and by-ways — of life surrounded by all kinds of temptations, yet, if he has will power, a sense of right and wrong, and does not forget the early teaching of his parents, he will, in the vast majority of cases, come out all right.

In preparing this work I have received, from friends and well-wishers, different suggestions and advice as to just how it should be featured, in this day and generation, in order to please and satisfy the public. A number advise, that unless it be well freckled with divorces, scandals, and sex complexes — something that will fairly scorch the covers — I am simply throwing away my time. I am still a little old-fashioned, so most of those topics will be conspicuous by their absence.

There are others, however, to whom I shall be ever grateful for their kind and timely advice, encouragement, and help. I feel under especial obligations, and herewith express my sincere thanks, to Leva Margaret Handy, Walter Noble Burns, Maurice G. Fulton, William S. Hart, J. Evetts Haley, the late Charles A. Siringo, E. A. Brininstool, William J. Chisum, Dr. and Mrs. James W. Yard, and Colonel George A. Skinner, Medical Corps, U.S.A.

HENRY F. HOYT

LONG BEACH, CALIFORNIA

June, 1929

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION, BY FRANK B. KELLOGG	xiii
I. A PIONEER BOYHOOD	1
II. MARKING THE BOUNDARY	8
III. I BEGIN TO STUDY MEDICINE	17
IV. OFF FOR THE BLACK HILLS	23
V. I HANG OUT MY SHINGLE IN DEADWOOD	31
VI. I GO AFTER GOLD	36
VII. OVER THE TRAIL TO SANTA FÉ	40
VIII. SEARCHING FOR JOHN CHISUM,	47
IX. INTO THE PANHANDLE	52
X. THE DOCTOR TURNS COWBOY	63
XI. AT THE PALO DURO RANCH WITH COLONEL GOOD-NIGHT	70
XII. BACK IN TASCOSA	77
XIII. BILLY THE KID GIVES ME A HORSE AND A BILL OF SALE	87
XIV. LIFE — AND DEATH — IN THE PANHANDLE	96
XV. I BECOME A BARTENDER AND EAT WITH JESSE JAMES	106
XVI. THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOVERNOR WALLACE AND BILLY THE KID	115
XVII. THE ASSISTANT POSTMASTER JOINS THE VIGILANTES	121
XVIII. DAYS OF VIOLENCE	127

XIX. HUMORS OF PRACTICE IN BERNALILLO	139
XX. MEN OF DIFFERENT KINDS COME TO MY STORE	146
XXI. I TESTIFY IN COURT AND CALL ON THE GOVERNOR	154
XXII. JESSE MARTIN'S GOLD MINE	162
XXIII. SILK HATS AND A LAST MEETING WITH BILLY THE KID	168
XXIV. I GO BACK TO MY STUDIES AND BOX WITH JOHN L. SULLIVAN	173
XXV. GETTING ON IN MY PROFESSION	180
XXVI. CHIEF SURGEON OF VOLUNTEERS IN THE WAR WITH SPAIN	187
XXVII. TO THE PHILIPPINES AND SERVICE UNDER FIRE	191
XXVIII. I GET A WOUND IN ACTION	199
XXIX. 'WITH GENERAL FUNSTON'S COMPLIMENTS'	206
XXX. HOME AND BACK AGAIN	213
XXXI. RAIDS, HUNTS, AND HOUSE-PARTIES	220
XXXII. A TYPICAL HIKE AFTER GUNS	230
XXXIII. AN ATTEMPTED TOBACCO CURE	242
XXXIV. 'THE BATTLE OF THE EGGS'	247
XXXV. BACK TO THE STATES AND PRIVATE LIFE	255

ILLUSTRATIONS

HENRY F. HOYT, 1929	Frontispiece
Photograph by Warren M. Sargent Studios, Long Beach, Cal.
HENRY F. HOYT, 1876	18
JOHN CHISUM, CATTLE KING OF NEW MEXICO	50
By courtesy of his nephew William J. Chisum, of Los Angeles
JOHN CHISUM'S HOME RANCH, PECOS VALLEY, N.M.	50
By courtesy of Mr. William J. Chisum
OUTLAW BILL MOORE, MANAGER OF THE LX RANCH	64
From Charles A. Siringo's Riata and Spurs
GROUP OF TEXAS PANHANDLERS IN 1884	84
W. S. Mabry; Frank James; C. B. Vivian, first county and district clerk of Oldham County, Texas; Ike P. Ryland; James H. East, sheriff of Oldham County in 1884; James E. McMasters, first county judge of Oldham County, witness to bill of sale of Billy the Kid to Dr. Hoyt; Patrick Garrett, the killer of Billy the Kid. Photograph furnished by Mr. East
WILLIAM H. BONNEY, alias BILLY THE KID	94
By courtesy of Mr. E. A. Brininstool
BILL OF SALE GIVEN BY BILLY THE KID TO DR. HOYT TO ESTABLISH HIS OWNERSHIP OF A HORSE	95
C. B. ('CAPE') WILLINGHAM AND JACK RYAN	100
By courtesy of Dr. and Mrs. James W. Yard, of Long Beach, Cal.
JESSE JAMES	112
By courtesy of Mr. Roberto Love, author of The Rise and Fall of Jesse James
FRANK JAMES	112
By courtesy of Mr. Love
COLE YOUNGER	112
By courtesy of Mr. Love

LETTER FROM GOVERNOR LEW WALLACE TO BILLY THE KID	116
From the original owned by Mr. Lew Wallace, Jr. Copy furnished by courtesy of Mr. Maurice G. Fulton, of Roswell, N.M.
BILLY THE KID'S REPLY TO GOVERNOR WALLACE	116
From the original owned by Mr. Lew Wallace, Jr. Copy furnished by courtesy of Mr. Maurice G. Fulton
GENERAL FREDERICK D. GRANT AND STAFF AT CHICKA- MAUGA PARK, JUNE, 1898	188
GENERAL ROYAL T. FRANK AND STAFF AT ANNISTON, ALABAMA, SEPTEMBER-OCTOBER, 1898	192
GENERAL ARTHUR MACARTHUR AND STAFF AT MALOLOS	196
Photograph taken by the Signal Corps of United States Volun- teers after the capture of Malolos, March 31, 1899, in front of the ruins of General Aguinaldo's palace and on the spot where Agui- naldo proclaimed the independence of the Philippine Republic
CERTIFICATE OF AWARD TO HENRY F. HOYT OF A SILVER STAR FOR GALLANTRY IN ACTION	204
FILIPINO SOCIETY LADIES IN THEIR NATIONAL COSTUME	216
Photograph presented to Dr. Hoyt in Manila in 1899
A GROUP OF IGORROTE WARRIORS FROM NORTHERN LUZON	216
HENRY F. HOYT, MAJOR AND CHIEF SURGEON, U.S.V., 1902	258

INTRODUCTION

THIS delightful book is the result of the variety of Dr. Henry F. Hoyt's occupations in different localities of the country during a long life, his capacity for registering what he saw and heard, and his ability to discern the relative value of incidents and events.

It has been my privilege to know Dr. Hoyt for many years; he has served as my family physician, and we have enjoyed together in days gone by hunting and fishing excursions and other pleasurable relaxations of which I retain pleasant memories. I am, therefore, very glad to introduce him to the reading public, and to bespeak for his book that favorable consideration which I am confident it merits.

Dr. Hoyt was born on a farm near St. Paul, Minnesota, in 1854, and was educated at country and city schools and the Minnesota State University. His first employment was in 1872 as a rodman in the survey of the railway between Glyndon and St. Vincent, Minnesota. In 1873 he was with an astronomical party in the survey of the boundary between the United States and Canada. This party was escorted by two troops of General Custer's cavalry which during the survey had several engagements with Indians. In 1874 he took up the study of medicine in the office of a St. Paul doctor. In 1875 he was an interne for one year in the Church (now St. Luke's) Hospital in St. Paul. In 1876 he was a student at the Rush Medical School at Chicago. To earn his way through college he practiced medicine at Deadwood, Territory of Dakota, during the summer of 1877. In the fall of that year he went to the Panhandle district of Texas, and is said to have been the first physician to practice medicine in that district. The country, however, was sparsely settled, and, finding his means depleted, he engaged himself as a cowboy. He made friends with Billy the Kid, who gave him the horse on which he left for New Mexico in October, 1878. He found no opening there for a doctor and he was soon again short of funds. He helped, however, to survey the new town of Las Vegas. Later he became the assistant postmaster at Las Vegas.

Early in September, 1881, he started East to attend college, graduating in 1882. He returned to St. Paul, and during his residence there became Commissioner of Health, member of the Governing Board of St. Joseph Hospital, member of the Pension Board, Chief Surgeon of the Great Northern and the Chicago and Burlington Railroads, and local surgeon for a number of others.

In 1898 Dr. Hoyt was commissioned Major and Chief Surgeon, United States Volunteers, and served as such from May, 1898, to October, 1902, first at Chickamauga Park and then in the Philippines, where he was for nine months Chief Surgeon of the Army commanded by General MacArthur, personally participating in twenty-five or more battles and engagements. He had the distinction, it is said, of being the only Chief Surgeon on the American side wounded on a battle-field during the Spanish-American War, or the insurrection in the Philippines. Later he was Chief Surgeon for more than two years of the commands of General Grant. He was recommended for a Brevet Lieutenant-Colonelcy by President Roosevelt, and in 1925, by order of President Coolidge, he was cited in General Orders for services in the 1899 campaign, the citation awarding him the Silver Star and a medal.

Dr. Hoyt is now a retired physician residing at Long Beach, California, enjoying in his old age the rest and rewards to which so active a life entitled him. He earned an education by roughing it in survey work, in cow-punching, and as a doctor in frontier districts, and he has filled many responsible positions, in none of which has he failed. His diversified life has been filled with many and varied experiences that have supplied him with a wealth of reminiscences and anecdotes which he relates in a manner that cannot fail to interest and please the reader.

FRANK B. KELLOGG

with us. This was James J. Hill, then working as a freight clerk at forty-five dollars a month. Many years later, when, by his remarkable foresight and acumen, he had risen to be one of the great railway magnates of the country, the head of the Great Northern Railway lines, I became chief surgeon of all his properties.

Very well do I remember also the many bands of Indians who visited the old farm, coming from the West with furs, buckskins, pemmican, and maple sugar to sell or trade. They camped all about our home during their annual visits, and as my father spoke their language they became very friendly. I attracted their special attention because I had a profusion of curly red hair. This they seemed to admire greatly, and I received many presents of moccasins, leggings, etc. My complacency with this state of affairs, however, was shattered by one of our hired men who told me that the reason they paid so much attention to my red curls was because they were preparing to go on the warpath, and as red scalps were very scarce, they would be after mine the first thing. At once there was a noticeable cooling in my friendship for the visitors.

Father had always bought from the Indians quantities of their maple sugar, which, with buckwheat cakes, was an ever-popular item on our winter morning breakfast menus. One day it was found out that they always strained the maple sap through their blankets, and from that time Indian maple sugar was taboo in the Hoyt family, and syrup from home-grown sorghum became the favorite sweetener.

It was the usual thing for these Indians to file silently into our kitchen in the early morning, squat around the kitchen stove, and gratefully eat the abundant leavings from our table that mother scraped into a dish and passed to them. Later on many of these very Indians were active in the terrible massacres that took place in Minnesota in 1862.

Father was a Major of the militia that organized for protection against this outbreak. Excitement was tense when one evening word came that the savages were within a few miles of Long Lake, or about twenty miles north of St. Paul, and the militia were instructed to meet at our farm at daybreak and march against them. How distinctly I remember sitting up the most of that night helping my father mould bullets for the anticipated encounter on the morrow. The militia assembled according to schedule and galloped away, leaving a weeping family at our home. The wily enemy, however, had disappeared, and no blood was shed.

Shortly after this, while going through the woods one day my father ran across an old muzzle-loading army musket, which he brought home, and, as I had just been taught to operate a shotgun, he gave it to me. It was very rusty, but I spent several days cleaning it up, and, as we had a fine twenty-acre grove just north of our house where game was always abundant, I loaded it and sallied forth. Soon I ran across an animal which appeared to be a rabbit and immediately blazed away, bringing down both myself and the quarry, for the old musket worked forcefully at both ends. Almost stunned, I finally got up, retrieved my game, and staggered home, only to be informed that I had been mistaken in my diagnosis of the species, and a burial of my clothes was ordered.

My memories of childhood also include episodes of the Civil War, in which five uncles and several cousins participated, receiving their training at Fort Snelling, just a few miles from home. I remember particularly the intense pleasure experienced on occasional visits there when watching General Gorman putting the raw recruits through their paces. Two of my uncles were members of the famous First Minnesota Volunteer Infantry which so distinguished itself at Gettysburg.

I grew into a strong, healthy lad, tall and athletic, and at thirteen was doing a man's work on the farm. This meant that I could shoulder a two-bushel bag of wheat without help and perform similar feats of strength and dexterity. My schooling was the usual sort that a country boy got at country schools, with the addition of a term at Lake City, Minnesota, a course at the Faddis Business College, St. Paul, and the sessions of 1870 and 1871 at the Minnesota State University.

My school term at Lake City was my last one in public school. While there I lived with my maternal grandfather, Henry K. Terrell, a former Virginian who had gone out to California in '49, and come from there to Minnesota in 1850. He was an ardent hunter and while I was there he took me on my first deer hunt over the territory near Mazeppa and the Zumbro River, the very district where my friend, William S. Hart, passed many of his childhood days.

The Faddis Business College was on Third Street, St. Paul. One evening when I was about to start home an argument arose as to who was the best runner in the class. To settle the dispute, a course was measured down Third Street, judges were selected, and another student, James Aherne, known to his friends as 'Slim Jim,' was paired off with me for the contest. Away we dashed in the moonlight. Soon Jim found I was gaining on him and being a great practical joker, he stopped suddenly, yelling at the top of his voice, 'Stop thief!' A big policeman appeared from somewhere and before I could get him to listen to me he had me well on the way to the station house. His name was Andy Call, now a special guard at the First National Bank of St. Paul.

My father decided that he could not afford to send me through college. I then asked and received permission to leave home and see if I could not earn enough to educate myself. I was convinced that he gave his consent with the idea that sooner or later I would be glad to return to the farm, but if this were so, he was mistaken.

My first inclination was to become a civil engineer, and learning that the St. Paul and Pacific Railroad was sending out a surveying party I applied to the chief engineer for a job. He looked me over, asked a few questions, and took me on. The proposed survey was to be from Glyndon to St. Vincent, paralleling the course of the Red River of the North. The party was in charge of C. A. J. Morris, a son of the chief engineer, and he had two assistant engineers, Henry Hollingshead and a Mr. Wheaton. I was given the position of rodman and worked with Mr. Wheaton, who operated the level.

Our outfit left St. Cloud for Glyndon in three covered wagons, the members of the party perching on top of the loaded vehicles as best we could. Our route ran along the east bank of the Mississippi by way of Little Falls — later the home of 'Lindy' — to Brainerd, thence to Glyndon. The country dirt road was very rough, ruts and deep mud holes being much in evidence. One of these holes would have written 'finis' to my earthly career had I been in less perfect physical trim. In passing through Little Falls, the right front wheel of the wagon dropped into a hole with a lurch that pitched me headfirst between the front and hind wheels. As my head was sinking in the mud, I somehow threw myself clear of it all just as the rear wheel crushed my fur cap deep in the mire with the weight of over a ton.

Reaching Glyndon, the party was organized. I knew nothing of the different positions, but it appeared that the rodman's job paid fifteen dollars a month more than the rest. Most of the party had been out before and knew this, so each was doing his best to pick the plum.

It was early in the spring of 1872, snow and ice were melting fast, and all the streams were swollen with rapid currents. It became necessary to cross the one at our camp. The stream was too deep and rapid to ford, so a raft was constructed and Engineer Morris called for a volunteer to swim across with a rope with which to pull the raft to and fro. There was plenty of floating ice and the stream was about twenty-five yards wide. I was the first to respond and, being a strong swimmer, I soon had the rope over and tied to a tree.

Next morning the men were assigned their duties by Mr. Morris, and I was selected as rodman, which I learned later was due to my alacrity in coming to the front at the ford.

Our course ran through a level country, mostly prairie, with an occasional strip of timber and underbrush. In places the entire prairie would be literally covered with grasshoppers, a scourge that virtually devastated western Minnesota for some years. To one fresh from our beautiful farm home, this seemed the most worthless country imaginable.

Reaching Red Lake River, the largest in that section, we found it high, with a swift current and plenty of ice still floating. Again it became necessary to use a raft. A clumsy one was built of green timber and started on an experimental trip, with Billy Gooding, son of the St. Paul Chief of Police, who was a chainman in our party, and myself, as the crew. Each of us had a long, strong pole to keep off the cakes of ice. At first all went well, but, when we struck the swift current and floating ice, our 'Injun yacht' began to whirl around and around. Then suddenly like a stricken submarine she sank to the bottom, leaving us swimming for dear life. Billy, who was a strong swimmer like myself, bumped into a chunk of ice that nearly sent him after the raft, but he shook it off and soon joined me in a downward career which, as usual, was not slow. We found to our dismay that the banks on either side were so precipitous that we could not climb out. We were forced to keep on swimming. The other members of the party were pacing along the bank, but powerless to help us. We must have been carried down at least a half-mile, chilled and almost exhausted, when we saw wild grapevines hanging over the bank. These proved our salvation. We grasped and hung to them while the boys quickly improvised a kind of sling with some willow withes and pulled us up. A rousing log fire soon dried and put new life in us. Crookston, Minnesota, with a population of seven thousand, now occupies the site of this near tragedy.

CHAPTER II

MARKING THE BOUNDARY

EARLY in the spring of 1873, I became interested in the Government Expedition sent out to survey the boundary line between the United States and Canada, from the Lake of the Woods on the northern line of Minnesota, west on the forty-ninth parallel of latitude to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

The English Government sent out a similar expedition to coöperate with the Americans. As the route was through a perfectly wild country, a strong escort was supplied by both governments, ours sending Troops D and I of the famous Seventh Cavalry, U.S.A., officered by Captains Weir and Keogh, Lieutenants Edgerly and Porter, and Captain A. A. Harback's company of the Twentieth Infantry.

Troop I, with Captain Keogh and Lieutenant Porter, was one of the five troops later wiped out with General George A. Custer at the battle of the Little Big Horn River in Montana, June 25, 1876. Troop D, with Captain Weir and Lieutenant Edgerly, I am told, was in Captain Benteen's command in this same memorable battle.

In St. Paul I had formed a close friendship with a young man about my age, Charles W. Paist by name, and we decided to make this venture together. We made application to join the expedition as civilian employees, were accepted, and shortly entrained on the Northern Pacific Railway for Moorhead, Minnesota, where we took a steamer down the Red River of the North for Pembina, Dakota Territory, where there was a small army post and where the expedition was to organize.

We arrived there about the first of May, 1873, with the mercury over 100° in the shade. There was great activity in every direction, and, after unloading the steamer and drawing all kinds of supplies from the Post, our camp sprang up as if by magic. Until our military escort arrived, we civilians were obliged to stand guard at night, my shift being from 2 to 4 A.M.

Nothing very exciting happened the first night until about 3 A.M., when a bunch of hungry hogs from a near-by half-breed's ranch made a raid on the commissary tents. The sentry there took them for thieves and opened up strong with a Sharp's carbine, and in a moment the entire camp was in an uproar. Everybody turned out and contributed his share. The result was that we were rationed with fresh pork for several days thereafter.

The military escorts soon began to roll in, accompanied with extensive mule trains, six mules to a wagon, driven by a 'mule skinner,' who rode the high wheeler, and steered his team with a single rein fastened to the bit of the high leader. A steady pull was the signal for a left turn, and several quick jerks meant that a turn to the right was desired. The rein was carried in the left hand, and its efficiency was reënforced by a whip, the handle of which was about two feet long and the lash about thirty, carried in the right hand of the 'skinner.'

When the expedition had assembled, the wagons were loaded to the limit with all kinds of supplies, and off we started. The column was divided into three divisions, Astronomical, Line, and Topographical. I was assigned to the first mentioned, and my friend Paist to the Line. The Astronomical Division was in charge of Captain Gregory, U.S.A., and the Line Division in charge of Lieutenant Greene, U.S.A. I have forgotten who commanded the Topographical Division.

The Astronomical party would take reckonings both day and night, establish the latitude and longitude, and sink a large post on the forty-ninth parallel of latitude. This accomplished, we would break camp and wend our way westward for sixty miles and proceed as before.

The British expedition was doing likewise, but they would plant their posts just halfway between ours, so there would be an astronomical post on the forty-ninth parallel of latitude every thirty miles. The Line party would follow, survey a straight line between the thirty-mile posts, and plant a post or put up a stone monument every mile. I am told that these original mile posts have since been supplanted by iron monuments. The Line party was followed by the Topographical party making topographical maps of the country.

As I was very fond of hunting, I had taken with me a good shotgun, the only one with the expedition. Game was plentiful, and as I was a good shot I kept our party well supplied with all kinds. The cavalry officers had a fine pack of hounds and as everybody had good horses to ride there was no limit to the sport we enjoyed. Captain Keogh's Comanche, later the only survivor of Custer's battle of the Little Big Horn, was one of the best among the Americans, and there were some splendid mounts among the English contingent also.

There was often but a short distance between our camps, and when this happened there was always more or less rivalry, athletic and otherwise, between us. I had had a course of training from Ned Moulton, at that period a famous professional sprinter, during my last year at the University of Minnesota, and could cover one hundred yards in ten and three-quarters seconds, rather fast for a non-professional six-footer weighing close to two hundred pounds. Ned had presented me with a very fine pair of calfskin, spiked running shoes, and I can truthfully say I was never beaten but once on this expedition, although I raced many times.

One day a bunch of our British neighbors came over and announced that they had heard we had a runner in our camp. If that was so they had a race to propose. They declared they had a man who would carry any one in our camp on his back and run with him fifty yards to our sprinter's one hundred. As we had a man weighing over two hundred pounds, our boys were all keen for the contest.

I consented readily enough to run, but strongly advised my friends not to wager anything on me, as I had never heard of any such race and had no idea what might be the outcome. The course was measured off, the preliminaries arranged, and we took our places. Anatomically my opponent was a freak. He was about five feet in height, with shoulders and chest very broad, body and arms very long, legs very short, body and limbs very hairy. In fact, as I looked at him fifty yards away, he seemed more like an animal than a human. Later I learned he was a Welshman, born and brought up in the coal district of Wales.

Our big boy mounted his back, the pistol cracked, and away we went. This was many, many years ago, but I can still visualize him as if it were but yesterday. His short legs worked with the rapidity of one of these modern movie stunts where the policeman is chasing a victim, only this was real, not reel.

I was in splendid form, never ran better in my life, but I was beaten by a few inches.

An opportunity soon presented itself, however, to get even with our British brethren. McCarthy, our champion mule skinner, had a joke he used to spring on any 'sucker' who would bite. He would place a coin on top of a tent pin sticking loosely in the sand or soft earth and at a distance of from ten to twenty feet would deftly remove the coin with a crack of his whip, without disturbing or touching the tent pin.

Then he would declare he could crack the coin from the seat of any one's trousers without touching the wearer. One of his mates would offer to bet quite a sum that he could not. This would lead to an exciting argument, the money would be put up, and the next move was to get the victim to hold the coin. In this instance, by considerable Western diplomacy, the one secured was from our neighbor's camp, he to have half the winner's stake.

The poor victim, full of visions of what a good time he would have with his share, would get down on all fours, the whip would crack — as would also about six inches of trousers and integument beneath. I can still see vividly the skyward jump our visitor made. If there had been an amplifier and loud speaker then, his yell would have been broadcast all over Canada. When he came down, he was ready to whip the entire Yankee camp and it took another half-hour of diplomacy to avert war.

Before I left home I had been taught by a young German a novel race which I introduced whenever I had an opportunity on this survey. I would run a hundred yards, turn a stake, and sprint back to the starting line against a man on horseback. At this stunt I never was beaten. Out West where good horsemen were the rule it was little trouble to arrange this race if it had never been seen before. However, it soon became well known through the expedition and it became difficult to find any one to compete with me. Occasionally, however, we would meet a roving band of half-breeds on a hunt, or a small party of traders from the Blackfeet Indian country, and, as they were always mounted and eager for sport, my race was soon in evidence.

We passed through all kinds of country. For days it would be level plain in every direction, then we would find the famous Bad Lands in spots along the Dakota and Montana line. Once we came to a valley near a stream and discovered a vast field of wild strawberries, the largest and most deliciously flavored of any I have ever tasted, with the possible exception of the famous Mexican strawberry that can be obtained every day in the year at Irapuato, a station on the Mexican Central Railway some distance north of the city of Mexico.

On another occasion farther west I started out from camp one day on a hunting expedition in the hope of bringing back a deer for the camp larder. I followed a trail up the side of a mountain for some distance until it led me into a little valley that formed a perfect natural amphitheater. Beside the sloping rocky sides nothing was to be seen except a pyramid of boulders in the very middle. On approaching it I could see the projecting ends of poles upon which the stones had been piled, as though something were secreted beneath. Visions of buried treasure prompted further investigation. I worked strenuously for about an hour heaving the rocks to one side till finally I was able to pull out a few of the poles. Below them was revealed a large cavity dug right out of the rock. The first object visible was a buffalo hide almost decomposed, and on tearing it away I saw a skeleton, sitting upright, surrounded by many skins of buffalo and bear. As strict orders had been issued to us that all Indian graves were to be unmolested, and as dark was coming on, I hastily replaced a few of the stones and returned to camp at a good sprinter's pace.

Although we traversed the very heart of an Indian country, some tribes of which were known to be hostile, we never had a glimpse of any Indians, until quite late in the season. Our scouts, of which we had several that were quite famous, often reported their proximity and whenever we were near high lands or mountains we would see their smoke signals.

Somewhere along the Montana line we were awakened in the middle of one night by the most unearthly yells, the thunder of many hoofs dashing over the ground, and the crack-crack-crack of rifles. It did not take long to realize that we were attacked by Indians. I was hardly awake when I heard the quick commands of the officers and in less time than it takes to write about it, our troopers were returning the fire. My shotgun in its case was the foundation of my pillow at night. I rolled over on my face, lying flat, unlimbered my gun, slipped in a couple of buckshot shells, and lay there awaiting developments. This was my first experience under fire and I was neither frightened nor excited. I had heard and read a lot about Indian fighting and decided to keep as near the ground as possible and so crawled out of the tent with my gun cocked, to reconnoiter and see if there was anything for me to do.

In a very short time, however, our enemies vanished and the horrible din ceased. The attack was for the purpose of stampeding our animals, but thanks to our system of corralling them, the drive was an utter failure. Morning disclosed three bullet holes through our tent, as well as many through others, but there was not a casualty on our side. Scouts found traces of blood in two places on the prairie and one dead Indian pony.

Later, when we were near the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, although still on the plains, the Indians set fire to the grass, during a very strong west wind, and this nearly developed into a tragedy. Our men at once started counter-fires, but before the ground cooled enough to allow us to take advantage of the cleared space, immense volumes of smoke overtook us, and for a time we were all in danger of suffocation. We covered our heads with our garments and kept as near the ground as possible. Troopers and drivers did their best to keep covers over the animals' heads, but some became unruly, rushed into the flames, and perished.

Late in the fall we neared the end of the season's work. Camp was made near a small stream fed by a spring. A terrific snowstorm, in the West termed 'blizzard,' came up and raged in all its fury for about a week. When it subsided, snow was twenty inches deep on the level and wherever there was any obstruction there were gigantic drifts. It was so fierce at its height that antelope actually came in bunches and huddled up on the leeward side of our tents.

The fall of snow was so tremendous that it absorbed all the water from both spring and stream. Many of our horses and mules perished and the situation rapidly became a very serious one. Fortunately, however, when every one had about lost hope, a grand old Chinook wind came pouring down from the mountains, the snow melted as rapidly as it had come, and the danger was over.

A conference of the officers was held and it was decided unanimously to take the home trail without delay. On account of the loss of mules, a number of wagons were abandoned and all baggage was reduced to a minimum. This was bad news to me, as I had collected during the summer a two bushel canvas bag of all kinds of curios, souvenirs, and mineral specimens, all of which I was obliged to leave behind.

The homeward trail was a little south of the line and was uneventful with one exception. Somewhere in northwest Dakota, as the Line party halted late one afternoon to pitch camp for the night, a flock of wild geese lit on the prairie a short distance away. My friend Paist borrowed a gun from one of the soldiers and started after a goose with the one cartridge that was in the piece.

Before he was close enough for a good shot, the geese became frightened and flew some distance to another resting-place. Paist, keen for a shot, kept after them until this had happened a number of times. Finally the chance came. He took good aim, fired, and missed.

It was cloudy when he left camp and when he now looked about for the way back, no camp was in sight. It grew dark very rapidly and at the same time a fierce blizzard came on. Paist quickly realized that he was lost, without an overcoat or mittens. He could see but a few feet in any direction.

He was soon missed at camp, but no one knew just what direction he had taken and the intensity of the storm precluded any systematic search. Guns were fired every few minutes all night, but the gale carried the sound the wrong way.

Paist had been familiar with life on the plains for some years and, when he realized he was lost, instead of trying to make camp he began to tramp in a circle. This kept him from freezing, and he was certain that if he could weather the night his comrades would find him in the morning. Following this plan saved his life, although it was a very close call. His hands and feet were badly frozen and it was a long time before he recovered.

During the preceding summer, Paist and I had interviewed a number of the fur traders. We learned of the enormous profits of the business, so decided to pool our resources upon our return and blossom out the next spring as bona-fide Indian traders with a string of Red River carts loaded with cheap calico, beads, etc. After his terrible experience in the storm, Paist most emphatically vetoed the proposed venture and vowed that nothing could tempt him from civilization again.

CHAPTER III

I BEGIN TO STUDY MEDICINE

FROM the post at Devil's Lake, Dakota, we hiked south to Jamestown, then the terminus of the Northern Pacific Railway. There we entrained and reached St. Paul about the first of December, 1873.

By this time, having thought much about plans for my future, I decided to become a doctor. I began the study of medicine and surgery with the late Dr. J. H. Murphy, of St. Paul, a well-known physician and surgeon of that period, and an uncle of mine by marriage. At the same time, my erstwhile partner, Paist, began the study of law in the office of John B. Brisbin, also of St. Paul.

Making good progress, I accepted, in the spring of 1875, the place of steward of the Church Hospital, an institution maintained by the ladies of the Episcopal Churches of St. Paul and now known as St. Luke's Hospital. I remained there one year, gathered a great deal of practical experience in my chosen profession, and then resigned to prepare to enter Rush Medical College for the session of 1876-77. Work was to begin the first week in September, and about August first I visited the Centennial Exhibition of Philadelphia, going by way of Chicago, Baltimore, Washington, and New York, making my first acquaintance with a large city.

I saw everything worth seeing at the great exhibition, including the first telephone, and Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, who, when he first listened to it, sprang back exclaiming, 'My God, it talks!' Best of all I had the pleasure of meeting Sir Joseph Lister, the famous English surgeon, father of antiseptic surgery.

September 7, 1876, while I was enjoying the Centennial, a band of eight men, splendidly mounted, each armed with a brace of Colt's forty-fives, galloped into the quiet, peaceful little village of Northfield, Minnesota, and halted in front of the First National Bank. Two dismounted and ran into the bank. The others sat on their horses, firing off their revolvers and cursing furiously with the idea of terrorizing any passers-by.

J. L. Heywood, the cashier, was alone in the bank when the two outlaws entered, threw their guns down on him, and ordered him to open the safe. He refused either to open the safe or to give the combination, and after cursing and threatening him without avail, one of them put a bullet through his brain.

In the mean time there was something doing outside. A young medical student, Wheeler by name, was in a doctor's office upstairs just across the street. Hearing the racket, he rushed to the window, took in the situation at a glance, tore down an old Spencer carbine that had been hanging on the wall since the Civil War, and, without hesitating a moment, opened up on the mounted bandits across the street, killing one of them, Clell Miller by name, in short order, and shattering the right elbow of another, Bob Younger; while a Mr. Manning with a rifle killed another, Bill Chadwell.

The two men in the bank, having failed to get the safe open, dashed out, sprang on their mounts, and made a quick getaway. As they fled from the scene, they met an inoffensive Swede along the roadway and, with a curse, fired a volley at him, killing him outright in cold blood.

The six that galloped from the bank scene were the three Younger brothers, Bob, Cole, and Jim, Jesse and Frank James, and Charley Pitts. The entire country was quickly aroused and posses were hot-foot after them in every direction. They began to realize their danger and, as they disagreed about the best route to follow, they separated, the James brothers going one way, the Youngers and Pitts another. The second day the latter were rounded up in a swamp, and, as they refused to surrender, they were all shot down and Pitts was killed.

HENRY F. HOYT
1876

The Youngers finally recovered and were sent to the penitentiary at Stillwater, Minnesota, for life. The body of Charley Pitts was taken to St. Paul, where my preceptor, Dr. Murphy, who was Surgeon General of the State, secured it and had it embalmed and preserved for dissecting purposes. Minnesota laws allowed all unknown or unclaimed bodies to be used in that way.

When I arrived home from Rush Medical College in March, 1877, the remains were turned over to me. Pitts was a fine specimen of physical manhood and I decided to retain and mount his skeleton for use in my office after my graduation. A good method of preparing a skeleton after dissecting is to bleach the bones under water for a year or so. Enlisting the help of one of my brothers, I packed the bones in an ordinary shoe box, putting in a few large rocks as sinkers. We drove out to the south branch of Lake Como, just inside the city limits of St. Paul, Minnesota, took the box out in a boat, and sank it about at the middle of the lake. We shall hear of that box later on.

While I was attending lectures at Rush Medical College, I boarded at the home of one Addison Snell, 771 West Van Buren Street, Chicago. Two other students, Van Dusen from Michigan, and Joseph G. Henderson from Iowa, were in the same house.

We were coming from downtown one afternoon and saw two women, richly dressed, approaching. Just before we met, one gave a cry and fainted away. The other screamed for help. Henderson was first on the scene, picked up the woman who had fainted, and carried her to a passing street car that was going in their direction.

The other woman was very profuse in her thanks. We went on our way, both Van Dusen and I sorry that Henderson had 'beaten us to it.' Nearing home Henderson reached for his watch, a valuable one, a present from his mother. It was gone. Our sorrow vanished.

At that time Allen Pinkerton lived not far from our place. We almost ran to his home and Henderson reported the incident. After asking a few questions, Mr. Pinkerton laughed heartily, and told Henderson not to worry, he would get the watch back. Sure enough, the next day it was returned and Mr. Pinkerton would take no fee for his services.

The first Tuesday in November, 1876, a President was to be elected. I never had voted for one. The Sunday morning before election day, while we were at breakfast, I heard some one say that the Republican and Democratic State Committees were giving passes on railroads to students in Chicago who would like to go home and vote.

Idea! I made a quick trip to the Grand Pacific Hotel on Clark Street, headquarters of one of the Committees — I never knew which one — found a group of men around a large table and told them what I had heard. They asked me a few questions and said that I had come to the wrong place, that I should go to a Mr. Keep at an address on Michigan Avenue. I noticed a sly wink or two and realized they were putting something over on me, or trying to. Thanking them for their kindness, I retired and smiled to myself as I heard them laughing.

I called at the office, asked the clerk who 'Mr. Keep' was, giving the number and street, and was informed that he was president of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company and that the address was that of his residence.

I decided that it would do no harm to call and walked down the avenue. It was Sunday morning, but I rang the bell. A maid came, and I asked if Mr. Keep was at home. She replied that he was and asked me what my business was. I replied 'Personal,' when I heard a voice exclaim, 'Bring him in.'

I was ushered into a large parlor to the left of the hall and was cordially greeted by a middle-aged man with a kindly face. I told him my story exactly as it all occurred, word for word, winks, laughs, and all. When I finished, he laughed as heartily as the committee and then began to ask me all kinds of questions about myself. I felt perfectly at home with him and gave him a lot of my experiences out West, in which he seemed very much interested. Finally, he pulled out a bunch of letters from a pocket, selected a yellow envelope and wrote something on its back and handed it to me.

'Take that to the address I have written, as early as you can in the morning, and if not too late you will have a chance to cast your first vote for a President of the United States.'

I was there not less than an hour, and with all his questioning he never said one word about politics, nor hinted as to which man I should vote for.

On my way home that Sunday, I called at the Grand Pacific Hotel and thanked the men for their kindness. Their surprise at the outcome of their jest was a sweet morsel to me.

Next morning I was at the depot early, my order for a round trip to St. Paul was honored, and I surprised my parents by walking in Tuesday forenoon in time to vote for Rutherford B. Hayes.

Many years afterward, when I was chief surgeon of the Great Northern Railway Lines, I attended at Chicago an annual meeting of the National Association of Railway Surgeons, to which I belonged, and while there I called on

Mr. Keep, who was still in the saddle as Chairman of the Executive Board of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company. When I reminded him of my adventure in 1876, he remembered it and we had a good laugh over it.

December 20, 1876, my old friend, Charles W. Paist, now a law student at St. Paul, surprised me with a visit. We had a fine time together, and on Christmas Eve dined at the Palmer House. After dinner I walked with him to the train, at the Northwestern depot, and bade him good-bye. From that moment no one who knew him has ever seen him. He simply vanished from the face of the earth. He traveled on two trip passes, one from Chicago to Elroy and another from Elroy to St. Paul. The first was taken up by the conductor, so he must have disappeared between Chicago and Elroy. A detective agency hunted for him for months, but never found the slightest trace. To this date, 1928, his fate has remained an unfathomable mystery.

CHAPTER IV

OFF FOR THE BLACK HILLS

FIFTY years ago, to obtain the degree of Doctor of Medicine, it was necessary to study a year or two under a preceptor and attend two courses of lectures at some reputable medical college. I had completed one course and was now ready to earn the necessary funds to enable me to graduate.

At this period, there were no laws regulating the practice of medicine and surgery, so I decided to locate in some live town and practice. Newspapers were full of the discovery of gold in the Black Hills. Deadwood was classed as the liveliest mining town in the country, so I selected that for my adventure.

Learning that Blakely, Carpenter, and Siams, of St. Paul, were preparing to put on a stage line from Bismarck to Deadwood, I decided to take that route. Bismarck was then the terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and when I arrived there about the first of May, 1877, I found that the first stage over the new route would leave in a few days. I was lucky enough to secure the last seat in the coach that was to make this historic journey.

I made the acquaintance of the clerk at the hotel, who told me that there was a passenger booked for Deadwood whom I should meet, as he was well known all through the West and could do me a lot of good should he take a fancy to me. He also added that he was a famous gambler.

Among the boarders at the Snells', where I had lived in Chicago, was a beautiful young woman, Mrs. John Bull, and her five-year-old son. Mr. Bull was supposed to be a traveling man. Mrs. Bull had told of his being a close friend of Mark Twain and to support her statement, exhibited with pride a beautiful, autographed de luxe edition of all Mark Twain's works up to that time.

I had seen Mr. Bull only once during that winter. The Snells had given a Christmas dinner to the boarders and he had been one of the guests. He had the appearance of a gentleman, was well mannered and well dressed, and in response to an inquiry during the dinner, he told of his acquaintance with the famous author.

Years before he had known Clemens as a newspaper man at Virginia City, Nevada. The story of the 'hold-up' by a party of his comrades one night when Clemens was coming home alone from some town across the divide, the tragic description he gave of it all when he arrived, and his chagrin when the 'joke' was exposed and his valuables returned is all a matter of history. John Bull was one of the party and laughingly told us how the young newspaper man could never see any joke in the affair. It was carried out much too realistically for any laughs.

'Dr. Hoyt, meet my friend Mr. Bull,' said the Bismarck hotel clerk. I turned around and to my surprise, Mr. Bull, 'famous gambler,' and the handsome, suave traveling man of Chicago, were one and the same. The surprise was mutual and he seemed pleased to meet me again. 'I am well acquainted with the Black Hills,' he informed me later, 'and will be glad to help you get a start.'

That evening he confided to me that he had a partner, but did not want it known. They had arrived late and so were obliged to sit on the front seat in the coach, and when he learned I was on the same seat, he asked me to sit between his partner and himself. He had in the mean time pointed out his partner to me on the street with the information that his name was Fish.

The Concord coaches used at this period had three seats, each seating three passengers, the rear and middle seats facing the boot, the front facing the rear. The boot also carried three persons, up in front. The company superintendent, W. J. Gidney, was present and very much to the fore at this time. Everything was in readiness and we all piled in. As was usual at that time, most of the passengers were well armed. Bull and Fish, however, had no arms in sight. Fish, myself, and Bull occupied the front seat facing the other six. In front of Fish sat a man whom I will call Prentice, a capitalist from Minneapolis. In the middle of the back seat was a young man from Minnesota who had sold out his business and was to try his luck at gold-digging. Superintendent Gidney, a big, good-natured, typical Westerner, sat on the boot with the driver.

The first day out, everybody got acquainted and all the men except Fish told more or less about themselves. He was a small man with features of Jewish type, dark eyes, hair, and skin. He sat wrapped up in a heavy overcoat with collar turned up, and was silent as the Sphinx.

The next day he began to thaw out. The recounting of various personal experiences was on the wane when suddenly Fish opened up with a line of Rube talk that would fool almost any one.

'Fellers,' he began, 'I was bawn on a meule fa'm in Missouri and last fall pa sent me to Chicago with a cyar-load o' meules t' see if I had any business in me. I sold them ar meules for a lot of money and lit out for home.

'In the smoking cyar I met a couple of fellers playing cyards. One of 'em laid three little cyards face daoun with a pictur on one, and sez he to me and his pard, "I'll bet neither of yous kin pick out the pictur cyard." I seed the pictur cyard all right, an' was sure I knowed jest which one it was. The feller that laid daoun the cyards took out a big roll of money. I was so dang sure I cud pick up that pictur that I did not want to let the other feller get ahead. I saw a big chance to make a lot, so I jerked my money out as quick as I could, put it by his roll, and reached over to pick up the pictur cyard, but the cyard I grabbed didn't have a thing on it.

'Gosh, but I was mad. I reached to grab my money, but they was too quick. The train stopped at a station and away they went. But they left them three cyards on the seat, so I tuk 'em home and have been working with 'em ever sinse. I got so I cud skin all the boys around the old fa'm, so I'm going to the Black Hills to skin some of them gold miners.'

Whereupon the young Missourian took off his overcoat, folded it across his lap, pulled a red bandanna from an inside pocket, and shook out of it three worn and dirty playing cards, two with spots and the other the queen of hearts. After producing a large roll of bills, he began to shuffle the cards back and forth on his lap in a very awkward manner. He finally turned the cards face downward, threw them back and forth carelessly in such a way that any one could easily pick the queen, counted out one hundred dollars from his roll and invited any of the passengers to cover it and pick out the queen.

Bull quickly pulled a roll of bills from his pocket, counted out one hundred dollars, and of course turned over the queen. Fish frowned, seemed quite vexed, shuffled again. Bull bet and won.

Fish now became quite enraged, threw the cards about, and refused to let Bull bet any more, but extended an invitation to the rest. By this time the six men facing us were quite certain that Fish was the raw product he seemed to be.

When he invited the rest I saw Prentice's right hand slip toward his pocket, but, before he could get to his cash, the young Minnesotan in the middle of the back seat sprang up and, reaching over the passengers in the middle seat, threw down a roll of bills. Then he reached for the card — but it was a two-spot!

His face registered chagrin, disappointment, and horror all at the same time, and he collapsed into his seat. The cat was now out of the bag and everybody, except the victim, roared. Bull shook his finger at the latter, exclaiming, 'You foolish man. Prentice here was the man we were after, and if you had kept out, we had him. I saw him reaching for his money.'

'Never mind, we'll get him yet' — this to Prentice, who quickly replied, 'Yes, you will, like Hell.'

'Mid jest and banter, the coach jolted along over the wild prairie. Shortly we ran into a prairie-dog town, the driver pulled up for a few minutes, and everybody jumped out. Prairie dogs were in every direction, barking an invitation to us to try our marksmanship. Out came revolvers and several volleys were fired without result, as Mr. Prairie Dog is wary and very hard to hit.

Bull watched the scene for a time. Suddenly his hand flew to his hip; a big six-shooter of the dragoon type with a short barrel was drawn. The gun barked, and a dead dog was the result. He apparently took no aim at all.

Toward evening we met the coach that had left Deadwood at the same time that we left Bismarck. It had been sent to Deadwood by way of Pierre. As we stopped a few moments to visit and get the latest news from Deadwood, Bull's victim decided he had enough of frontier life, and he was permitted by Superintendent Gidney to use the rest of his transportation in returning to Bismarck on the northbound coach. That left a vacancy in our coach.

Some hours after, we overtook a covered wagon, driven by three young men. Two were brothers from Minnesota, druggists who had sold out and expected to go into business in Deadwood. Their team was well fagged out and very slow. They were in a hurry to get to the hills and inquired if they could get passage on our stage.

Gidney told them there was only one vacancy. They drew lots for it and the winner took the middle seat in the back. We had jogged along for a short time when Fish began to spin his yarn again, but this time he told an entirely new story, and instead of three cards he worked with only two. Bull won as before several times, and was barred. While talking and idly shuffling the two cards, Fish, apparently without knowing that he did so, tore a tiny bit from the corner of the picture card. This bait proved too much for the new victim. His roll came out as rapidly as that of number one.

Later the victim explained that he and his brother had divided their funds and he was so sure he should win that he wanted to give him a very pleasant surprise when he joined him at Deadwood. It was the old story. He was sure Fish had blundered and he was quick enough to bet on what he thought was a sure thing. He appeared afterward 'a sadder and a wiser man.'

During the forenoon of our last day on the plains, we crossed what Superintendent Gidney and the driver, both old-time Western men, declared was an extensive Indian trail, not over three hours old. Later it was learned that it was the trail of Red Cloud, the Sioux chieftain, on the war path with several thousand warriors. It was a wonderfully narrow escape for us. Although we were all armed, our little party would have lasted but a few minutes had we encountered that army of savages.

Some time before sundown we came in sight of Bear Butte, a lone rock that rises majestically from the plains, a landmark which can be seen for many miles and which is not very far from the entrance to the Black Hills on the way to Deadwood. Here we overtook another covered wagon drawn by a team of horses. The occupants were a man, his wife, and a hired hand, all from Minnesota and en route for the Black Hills. We halted, told them of the nearness of the Indians, doubtless on the war path, and urged them to get into the hills as rapidly as possible.

The men laughed at us, saying that they were Westerners, knew all about Indians, were well armed and perfectly able to take care of themselves.

We drove on, entering the hills about dusk and arrived at the metropolis of the Black Hills before midnight. There was only one street, built along the gulch, Main Street, in fact as well as in name, and although the hour was late it was swarming with humanity. Saloons, gambling and dance halls on both sides of the street were in full blast. All in all it was a wonderful sight for a tenderfoot.

While in Deadwood I met many who had been in every mining camp in the country since '49, and the universal opinion was that Deadwood was, at that time, by far the wildest of them all.

The coach pulled up in front of the I. X. L. Hotel, fronting on Main Street on the opposite side from the stables and office of the North-Western Express, Stage & Transportation Company, the line by which we had come.

We all put up at the hotel, a two-story frame building, with rooms divided only by canvas partitions. The owner and landlord, Johnny Van Danager, turned out to be an old friend of John Bull, as they had been together in the South African mining camps some years previously. He was a genial 'mine host' and did what he could to make us comfortable.

Next morning the news was brought that our party in the covered wagon from Minnesota had disregarded our warning, gone into camp at Bear Butte, and had been attacked in the night by Indians. They were all massacred and frightfully mutilated.

If my memory is correct, a mounted party was soon made up and was fortunate enough to overtake a small bunch of the savages. Two scalps were brought in as trophies.

CHAPTER V .

I HANG OUT MY SHINGLE IN DEADWOOD

I SPENT my first forenoon in Deadwood searching for something to rent for an office but could not find even an available drygoods box from one end of the gulch to the other. Returning to the I. X. L. Hotel for dinner, I made a strong effort to rent a room or two from my landlord, but was promptly turned down. 'Impossible,' he decided.

At this juncture John Bull entered and I was greeted with, 'What's the good word, Doc?' Hearing my predicament, he called the landlord, Van Danager. 'Van, meet my friend Dr. Hoyt. I want you to let him have a room where he can hang out his shingle and go to work.'

'Johnny,' replied Van, 'I would be glad to, but I'm chuck full all the time and it's impossible.'

'I know you are,' said John, 'but he doesn't want you, he wants a room in the hotel.'

'Nothing doing, John. As I told you before, that settles it.'

Bull's genial smile, ordinarily present, faded away. His eyes flashed and stepping close up to Van he remarked in a low tense tone, 'Did you hear what I said? Dr. Hoyt is my friend.'

Not another word was said, but Van showed a sickly grin on his face and I was given the best room in the house.

Although I was mighty glad to get this room, I was certainly practicing medicine under difficulties. The room was about twelve feet square, a bed on each side with about a three-foot strip between as one entered, leaving a space of about six feet from the foot of the beds to the outside wall, where there was one small window with a cheap washstand, bowl and pitcher beneath. The hotel was not exactly what would be termed sound-proof, as all partitions were canvas. Two small chairs completed the equipment.

Once between midnight and morning, while I was there, a man occupying a bed in the rear room on my side of the hall came in slightly drunk, found some one in his bed, started a row, and gun play was made, resulting in both being badly wounded. In the morning it was found that two bullets had passed through every partition on that side of the building, about five feet from the floor. I was about the only one who profited by that affair.

I purchased a small gold-scales outfit, had an old miner in the house teach me how to weigh dust, and after putting a card in the paper announcing the arrival of a new doctor, I spread out my few drugs and instruments, and was ready for business.

I held my office hours from 9 A.M. to 4 P.M. I had a roommate of course every night, in the other bed, and this often made it more or less awkward, as not infrequently the man-on-the-other-side would come in after midnight well soused and want to sleep all the next day. Being big and strong, I would pick him up, like a movie villain abducting the hero, and dump him into an empty bed in another room.

A few days after I began my practice I got a call to go ten miles over the mountains. I responded on horseback and found a man with an arm badly shot up. He had lost a good deal of blood and was weak. I fixed him up, was paid a fat fee in dust — very little money was in circulation at that time in the Black Hills — and returned home.

The day after my mountain trip, I went to the bank and to my dismay was told that a good part of my dust was 'phony.' I mounted my mustang, made another fast ride over the mountains, determined to bring back some good dust or a scalp, but when I arrived I found that the bird had flown. I never ran across him again. As the result of this experience I provided myself with a bottle of testing acid, so this trick was never duplicated.

Mr. Prentice also put up at the I. X. L. Hotel, and both he and Mr. Bull usually dropped in to my office sometime during the day for a friendly chat.

One day Bull burst in, wildly exultant over something. This was unusual, as he was ordinarily rather quiet and dignified.

'I got him! I got him!' he cried, slapping his leg.

'Got who?' I asked.

'Prentice, I told you I'd get him. I finally landed him in my game and cleaned him for five hundred dollars. I have laid for him for days and have got him at last.'

Bull had not been gone ten minutes before in came Prentice, scarcely less mirthful and excited than Bull. 'By gosh, Doc,' he said, 'I got him.' 'John Bull,' he added, seeing a quizzical expression in my eyes. 'Cleaned him up to the tune of five hundred dollars.'

I indulged in a hearty laugh and with the remark, 'Now I'll tell one,' gave Bull's side of the story. To this Prentice replied:

'He did think so, but it was thought only. This is the way it was. I sat in his game and got hung up for five hundred dollars. I said I'd have to cash in. "I need all the money I've got with me for business to-morrow, so I'll have to ask you to take this draft!" He bit, took the draft and counted out five hundred dollars in change. The draft was for one thousand dollars and it was no good!'

Such was life in the Far West fifty years ago. John Bull was a character in his way, one of the best in his line, and withal a kind-hearted man and a mighty good friend. This sketch would hardly be complete without a description of our last meeting.

After leaving the Black Hills in September, 1877, I lost all track of Bull. Some time in the nineties I entered a car at St. Paul, Minnesota, my home at that time, on my way to the City Hall at Minneapolis. As I sat down in the only vacant place, I recognized John Bull as my seat mate. He gave me a cold stare when I spoke, evidently taking me for some former victim, but was most cordial when I identified myself.

At the end of the ride, I invited him to dine with me that evening and hark back to the old frontier days. Hesitating a moment, he replied, 'Doc, I would be delighted, but I have a deal on and if it goes I shall fade away; if not, I will sure be there.' He did not appear and the newspapers next morning explained the 'deal,' amounting to several thousand dollars, all of which accounted sufficiently for his 'fade-away.'

We have never met since. At the time of this writing (1928) I learned from good authority that with all his experiences and ups and downs, he has never been behind the bars, which fact demonstrates both brains and an unusual efficiency of its kind.

He had, however, one very close shave.

Before we parted at the Minneapolis depot that day, we chatted for a few moments, then he went in one direction while I went in another. I was quite elated over the meeting, as Bull had been kind to me in every way when I needed help, and I anticipated a pleasant visit that evening.

To see if I was on time for my appointment I reached for my watch which was a very fine one and had been a present, and which I carried in my right hand vest pocket without chain or fob. It was gone.

It would take a number of pages to describe my thoughts for the next minute. I do not remember ever being more furiously angry. The idea that I, a man of the world, mixing with all kinds of people all over this country, Mexico, and Canada, had finally run across a supposedly old-time friend and he had picked my pocket!!! Whew!

My appointment was at the City Hall. I was well acquainted with both the chief of police and the detectives. I hadn't forgotten how to sprint, so I resolved to fly to the Hall and in a few minutes set the entire force on poor John Bull's trail. I started up Washington Avenue at a gait that astonished the people on the sidewalk. Some one had opened a hydrant and a stream of water about six feet wide was pouring from an alley across the sidewalk into the gutter. Reaching the stream, I cleared it with a leap, and as I landed on the other side, I felt something bump me in the right groin. Slowing up, I reached down and there was my watch down in the corner of my long vest. The lining of the pocket had become worn through and the last time the watch went in, it had kept on going.

It will take a strong imagination for my readers to realize my revulsion of feeling at my discovery. But for that stream of water, John Bull would have been behind the bars in a very short time and I should never have forgiven myself.

CHAPTER VI

I GO AFTER GOLD

AMONG my patients in Deadwood was a young mining engineer, Bailey by name, who had a contract with a Chicago syndicate to prospect for gold in the Black Hills. If he discovered a quartz proposition that would average twenty-five dollars to the ton, they would finance and develop it, giving him fifty per cent.

Fifty years ago, no one would look at a lode mine that averaged less than twenty-five dollars a ton. There has certainly been some progress in mining methods since then, when one of the best gold mines in this country is the Homestake, right in that district, that averages a trifle less than two dollars to the ton.

One day we visited the grave of the most famous 'two-gun man' the West has ever known, Wild Bill Hickok. It was on an eminence to the left of the gulch not far from the center of the town, going west, and was marked only by a pine slab driven into the ground at the head. The name and inscription was written on the slab with a carpenter's pencil. I have been informed that there is now a monument at the grave.

Wild Bill was murdered in Deadwood in 1876 by one Jack McCall. They were in a poker game and Bill reprimanded Jack for some breach of poker ethics. A day or two later, McCall walked up behind Bill when he was sitting in a game and shot him dead. Jack escaped, but was captured about a week later near Fort Pierre and hanged. In the fall of 1877 I met Wild Bill's partner, Colorado Charley (Charley Utter), at Santa Fé, New Mexico, and he showed me Bill's sombrero with the bullet hole through the center of the back of the hat band.

Bailey decided he wanted a husky partner, so began to tempt me to join him.

I finally accepted Bailey's proposition to close my office and prospect for gold, and he formally transferred a half interest in his Chicago contract to me. I outfitted with blue flannel shirts, corduroy trousers, miners' boots, pick, shovel, and gold pan and the hunt was on.

We traveled over a good portion of the Black Hills, finding plenty of low-grade quartz deposits, but nothing near our limit. One day we climbed to the summit of Custer's Peak, one of the highest of the hills, and while resting enjoyed the wonderful vista in every direction. Many had preceded us, as was shown by initials, names, etc., carved on rocks and the trunks of beautiful pine trees all about us.

From the foot of the peak on one side there stretched out an extensive natural basin, probably a mile in diameter and almost as symmetrical as one of our modern stadia.

Clouds began to gather, and in a short time we witnessed a phenomenon of nature that I have never seen duplicated. A fierce electric storm came up, thunder, lightning, and a heavy rain, all below us, while above was beautiful sunshine. It did not last very long, and at the end, a rainbow appeared, one end extending right into the center of the basin so low down that it seemed to touch the tops of the pines with which the valley was densely covered.

We joked about the traditional pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, shouldered our equipment, and started for camp, which, as it happened, was on the other side of this basin, our trail leading directly across it.

When part way over, Bailey, who was behind me, called in an excited tone for me to come back. He had in his hand a piece of float about the size of a hen's egg and declared it to be very richly mineralized, asserting that if we could find its source our quest was over.

It was getting late, so we stripped the bark from one of the pines, wrote our location notice on its surface, and named it the 'Rainbow Mine.'

The next day that piece of float was assayed in Deadwood and it ran about fifteen thousand dollars to the ton in silver. In mining terms it was called almost pure horn silver.

The find leaked from the assay office and we were shadowed by quite a mob of miners for some time, but by a little strategy we sidetracked them and for the next few weeks we concentrated on this basin. While from the top of Custer's Peak it seemed very symmetrical, it was really rugged and very much broken and hard to prospect. We carefully scouted over its entire surface and rim without discovering the slightest trace of the origin of our wonderful sample of float. There is no question in my mind but that there is a remarkably rich lode of silver in that vicinity and some time it may be discovered. Perhaps it has already been found.

By this time I was tired of prospecting and, being seized with an attack of wanderlust, I began to plan to work my way toward South America. I severed my partnership with Bailey and returned to Deadwood, now a wild and woolly town. Seldom a day or night passed without a brawl or shooting affair. Gambling dens, dance halls, and sporting houses were wide open in every direction.

Miners came in in droves on Saturday nights, and surely made the dust fly. One night I heard a commotion and down the street came a woman on a horse at full gallop. She had a Colt's forty-five in each hand, and both were in action, the bullets flying in every direction, while the rider emitted a good imitation of an Indian warwhoop at every jump of her mount. This was my first close-up of that well-known figure of the pioneer West, Calamity Jane. She was dressed in soldier's uniform and was the first female I had ever seen riding astride.

She and a 'Madam Moustache,' a little Frenchwoman with quite a shadow on her upper lip, who dealt at a 'Twenty-One' table in one of the gambling halls, and one other, whose name I cannot remember, were very much in the limelight in those days.

Madam Moustache was one of the most popular women of her class in Deadwood. She could speak five languages, was always polite and well gowned, and her table was always the center of a crowd. Rarely without a smile, her voice low and musical, she presented a very attractive picture as she would call out her game, with a very charming accent, 'Gentlemans, I haf twenty-von, vat haf you?' a phrase that was heard so often it almost became a byword in Deadwood.

CHAPTER VII

OVER THE TRAIL TO SANTA FÉ

EARLY in September, 1877, with Hugh B. McCune and two Germans, I left Deadwood for the South. Our equipment consisted of a covered wagon, a span of mules and three saddle horses, and a camp outfit with plenty of provisions and ammunition. We were well armed. I carried an octagon-barreled Ballard rifle and a Colt's forty-five revolver, as the Sioux were still on the war path.

Following the trail used by the Gilmer-Salisbury stage line from Deadwood to Cheyenne, we averaged about twenty-five miles a day, taking turns standing guard at night until we neared Fort Laramie. From there on until we reached New Mexico there was no more danger from Indians.

Shortly before we left Deadwood the Gilmer-Salisbury stages had been held up and robbed by four men not very far from that city. The trail ran down a deep cut in the high banks of a dry stream and here the stage had been held up several times. The robbers concealed themselves under the bank on both sides and as the leaders arrived at the bottom of the cut they would step into sight and turn their trick. Mute evidence of their work still showed in the way of all kinds of articles, bits of paper, etc., scattered through the sand from baggage and mail sacks that had been overhauled.

A bunch of cowboys had driven a herd of cattle from Texas to the Black Hills, sold them, gambled and frittered away the proceeds in the underworld of Deadwood, and, becoming desperate, had adopted this method of recouping their finances in order to report to the owners of the herd in Texas. The notorious Sam Bass was a member of this gang and the robbing of these stages is supposed to be his maiden effort as an outlaw.

As we pitched camp the evening after passing this dry stream four men rode up, mounted on splendid horses and armed to the teeth, and asked us all kinds of questions. They were invited to dismount and take pot-luck with us, which they finally did. We intuitively knew they were the outlaws the moment they appeared and if they had sized us up as a party going home loaded with dust from the Black Hills, there is no telling what might have happened.

Right then there was a large reward for the capture of these men, dead or alive, and had we been expecting them and planned accordingly there were several times after they dismounted when we might have captured them, but their appearance was too unexpected for anything punitive on our part. While they were eating they gave us a lot of information about trails and good camps, after they learned we were headed for New Mexico. About bedtime they rode away and we saw them no more.

One evening we camped at Telegraph Springs Ranch just twenty-five miles from Fort Laramie. It was owned and managed by the widow of a physician, formerly one of the faculty of a St. Louis medical college. In addition to caring for a bunch of cattle and horses she had a small store and also kept feed and hay for the stage line and passers-by. Hay was cut from the vast prairie in the vicinity and she only asked ten cents a pound for it.

Coming from the north we crossed a bit of high land a short half-mile from the ranch with a down grade in the trail. Just before sundown, hearing a commotion outside, we rushed from the camp-house to investigate and saw a sight not to be forgotten. Silhouetted against the sky along the top of this ridge were at least fifty Indians, mounted on prancing horses, flourishing their rifles, gesticulating with their arms, altogether a very warlike picture. The ranch had no doubt come unexpectedly into view upon their gaining the summit of the ridge and they had halted to confer as to their next move.

Our hostess, the first woman I had ever seen wearing bloomers, was apparently cool and mistress of the situation. She had eight men on the ranch and with the reinforcement of our party of four, there was little danger, as all the buildings were of good-sized logs built and arranged for defense purposes. She quietly directed how her little force should be posted to the best advantage and then suggested a volley or two just to let the enemy know there was somebody at home.

When we opened fire the picture on the hill vanished almost as quickly as it had appeared, and we saw no more Indians.

In the morning the wearer of the bloomers told us of a large body of mineralized rock in the mountains some ten miles west of her ranch and learning we had prospected in the Black Hills she offered to guide us, bring in samples, and have them assayed at Cheyenne. If the assay was favorable she wanted to go fifty-fifty on the deal.

I was elected to go after the specimens and on the way was entertained by my guide with stories of how many times she had taken hunters after big game only to see them miss when the opportunity came. As I had never killed anything in the way of game larger than a wild goose, I offered a silent prayer that we would meet no game that day.

We reached the rock ledge, got a fine lot of specimens, and started back home. Thus far my prayers had been answered, but when we were within about a mile of the ranch the tide turned. We were ambling single file along an old buffalo trail, and I was in the lead with my Ballard rifle balanced on the pommel of my saddle, when I glanced to the right and saw, not over one hundred yards away, a big blacktailed buck deer standing broadside on with his head turned toward us. I shall never forget my sensations at that moment. Instead of having a violent case of the buck ague that I always understood attacked a tyro at such a moment, I was never more composed or self-possessed in my life. Had that deer been on my left I should have shot from the saddle, but now I quickly slid from my horse, dropped on one knee, drew a bead just behind the fore shoulder, and pulled the trigger. The buck reared on his hind legs, whirled, and darted away. My gun was a single shot and I was reloading as rapidly as possible, but, before I had slipped the cartridge in, my quarry reared again on his hind legs and fell over backward, dead.

I actually believe my guide was even more pleased than I was. It seemed she was a dead shot herself, as was evidenced by some target shooting that was indulged in next morning. She was also a remarkable horsewoman and was riding a beautiful Kentucky thoroughbred that was her favorite mount. During the mountain part of our trip she led me through places where had I been alone I think I should have dismounted and hoofed it.

We lived high on venison for several days, but the assays at Cheyenne failed to pan out — another golden bubble busted!

At the Chug Water, a small stream a short distance north of Cheyenne, we met a large herd of cattle from Texas with a convoy of cowboys, the first of the kind I had ever seen.

Traveling south along the east slope of the Rockies, we passed Denver, Colorado, and camped one night near the home of a rancher by the name of Jones. McCune had a violin, on which he and I could play any old tune by ear and main strength. We would aim to go into camp as near some ranch as possible and fiddle a few tunes. Almost invariably visitors would appear and get acquainted, and in a short time one would think we were stockholders in the ranch by the dividends of vegetables, fruit, melons, milk, butter, and eggs that would roll in.

Rancher Jones had several daughters, a charming schoolma'am was boarding there, other neighbors were near, so an impromptu dance was started and everybody had a fine time. Mr. Jones had a large field of wheat in the shock, and was very short of hands. As we bade him good-night he asked us to mention that fact to any men we might meet on the road.

It seemed they had taken us for lucky gold-diggers from the Black Hills and never dreamed that we might help them out. When we reached camp I suggested that we offer our own services in the morning to help stack the grain, as we were below par financially and he offered four dollars a day and board.

My companions were willing, but none could stack grain. Fortunately I was familiar with farm work and as any one could pitch the bundles, the next forenoon found us all in the field. Mr. Jones, more than happy at our condescension, treated us like princes. At the end of four busy days he had as fine a bunch of wheat stacked as one would wish and we went on our way well satisfied with the adventure.

Pueblo and Trinidad were in the throes of a smallpox epidemic. It seemed as if a yellow flag, the sign of quarantine, was upon almost every other house. Leaving Trinidad, Colorado, we crossed the Raton Mountains, following the historic Dick Whooten toll road and the Old Santa Fé Trail, exactly the same route taken later by the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway.

We followed the Old Sante Fé Trail through Las Vegas and on to Santa Fé. Shortly before reaching Santa Fé we heard of a fine game country north of the Trail, so we struck off into the mountains and made camp on the Pecos River, where a small mountain stream flowed into it. Just above us was a deer-lick — a small deposit of salt in the rocks near the stream where deer could be found almost any night.

Wild turkey were abundant, plenty of trout were in the stream, and we were in clover. I had been trading, and now carried a Sharp's carbine in the place of my Ballard rifle. It had twice the range of the rifle and carried a larger bullet.

The mountains in the vicinity were well timbered with pine, spruce, and cedar, with an occasional grove of a sort of dwarf oak with very large acorns in abundance.

One day I struck out alone and tramped for hours without a sight of game, which was quite unusual. Growing weary I sat down under a shady pine resting my back against its trunk. The view was superb. A few feet in front was the edge of a precipice of rock that dropped down for about one hundred feet and then gradually sloped off at an angle of about forty-five degrees, the surface of the slope almost covered with a heavy growth of dwarf oak. I could see for miles in every direction and the scenery was wild, rugged, and picturesque.

I was almost dozing when I heard a very peculiar noise. Listening intently I finally located it as coming from the oak grove. It seemed to be moving toward me. It was a sort of grunting noise, sounding as if an animal was rooting in the ground. I decided it came from some stray hogs and paid no attention to it.

Suddenly something moving caught my eye, and to my astonishment there at the edge of the grove were three huge cinnamon bears, grunting and rooting industriously in the leaves and earth after acorns. The wind was from them, so they did not scent me and as I was so far above them and sat perfectly still they did not see me, and for the next few minutes I had a very novel spectacle of bear on their native heath. It was murder pure and simple, but I was young then, a hunter, and I decided to get all three. The largest was farthest from me, so I decided to take him first with the idea that the others would then run toward me. I dropped him in his tracks with a shot just behind the ear, and exactly as I expected the other two dashed toward the foot of the precipice as I threw out the shell and started to push in a fresh cartridge.

I had a belt around my waist holding sixty cartridges and the one I grabbed to reload with stuck as I tried to push it home and I could get it neither in nor out for some time, time enough for the two lucky ones to make a perfect getaway. That was the only misfit cartridge in the belt.

Making a détour to get around the precipice, I bled my trophy and made tracks for camp, where I found nobody at home. Saddling one of the mules, I galloped to the home of some near-by Mexicans, commandeered two of them, and by their help, after blindfolding my mule, succeeded in reaching camp with by far the biggest bag of game I had ever chalked to my credit. After we skinned the animal, it was divided between the Mexicans and ourselves, and everybody was happy.

CHAPTER VIII .

SEARCHING FOR JOHN CHISUM

AFTER reaching Santa Fé our quartet broke up, the Germans deciding to go to Arizona, while McCune and I struck out in a southeasterly direction toward Anton Chico on the Pecos River. My companion had what would be called at this period a cow-complex, and he had it bad. He learned at Santa Fé there was a man down the Pecos Valley, John Chisum by name, commonly known there as 'The Cattle King of New Mexico,' who would round up nearly one hundred thousand head. It was reported that he would let out cattle on shares to a reliable man, so John Chisum was McCune's objective. Mine was a promising location to begin again the practice of medicine.

I had disposed of my mount and McCune and I were both traveling in the covered wagon. The route lay through a perfectly wild country with only an occasional habitation, many times without even a trail. In several instances the grade was so steep that we were compelled to tie up all four wheels.

At night the mules were hobbled and turned loose to graze. One morning they were missing. Finding their trail, we soon discovered they were being driven by some one on foot. With our weapons ready we trailed them for about two miles to a small clearing where stood an adobe house on the edge of a small patch of growing corn in which our mules were busy at breakfast.

We removed the hobbles, which had rubbed the mules' legs until they were bleeding. We were just starting back bareback for camp when five Mexicans rushed from the shack and halted us. All were very much excited, evidently making some demand, but as we did not understand Spanish there was a deadlock. Two, who seemed to be leaders, were armed and handled their guns rather carelessly, or so it appeared to us. The sign language was resorted to, and they showed where the mules had eaten their corn for which they demanded money.

We, in turn, showed that they had driven the mules in themselves, pointed to the bloody fetlocks, pretended to be as angry as they, showed our weapons, and plainly gave them to understand they could get nothing from us but a fight. Then we started for camp, leading the animals until we got out of sight, when we mounted and the incident was closed.

There was game in abundance throughout this journey and as we had both become first-class camp cooks we lived like epicures.

Arriving at the Pecos River near Anton Chico we forded it, finding a very good trail on the east bank which we followed to Fort Sumner, also called 'Bosque Redondo' (Round Grove). Going south, about four miles from the post we entered a beautiful wide avenue of majestic cottonwoods which we traveled along till we reached the post.

Bordering on this avenue were orchards of peaches and apricots loaded with luscious fruit, and vineyards with an abundance of the famous Mission grapes — all going to waste as there was no market. There was no railway south of Trinidad, Colorado, and, except for what the people at Fort Sumner ate, the only use made of all this fine fruit was to fatten hogs.

Ten years earlier this had been an important post, with a large garrison and over nine thousand Navajo and Apache Indians, who were being fed by the Government. Later the post was abandoned and sold to Lucien B. Maxwell, of Maxwell Land Grant fame, who had moved his family here from Cimarron, New Mexico. It was now their home.

The Maxwell family occupied buildings that had formerly been officers' quarters, a short distance from and facing the Pecos River, on the bank of which we made camp. In a short time we had a visitor, a little old wrinkled chap with a sharp Roman nose, who was curious to know who we were, for passing travelers were rare. He was William Betts, called 'Old Betts,' and turned out to be quite a character. He had been a noted rider and was Mr. Maxwell's chief jockey when that gentleman kept an extensive racing stable during his palmy days. Old Betts was one of the few old retainers left and was treated almost as one of the family.

Learning that I was a physician, he made a bee line for the house and in a few minutes I received a call and was ushered into the bedroom of William Maxwell, the eldest son of the family and my first patient in New Mexico. I found him dying with a severe case of malignant smallpox for which nothing could be done. He was beyond help. Incidentally, however, I did some vaccinating while at Fort Sumner.

One relic of former magnificence here was the remains of a splendid coach made to order in St. Louis and used in the old days to transport, with an armed and mounted escort, the Maxwell daughters to and from the Eastern convents where they were being educated. It was now parked by the stables and utilized as a favorite roosting place for poultry.

We rested here for a few days, meeting most of the people in the vicinity, one of the most interesting being a very beautiful señorita, Lolita by name, who was about fifteen and as bright and charming as she was beautiful. She will appear later.

McCune was impatient to get on so we bade farewell the hospitality of Fort Sumner and followed the Pecos River Valley for about one hundred miles south. Two days after leaving the post we met the first bad weather of the trip. We had just baked a kettle of beans in a 'bean hole' full of live coals, when it began to rain. This rain kept up for exactly four days. But for those beans we should have had a sorry time, as the wind was high and a fire was impossible. I have never been able to get up much enthusiasm for baked beans since.

A FRONTIER DOCTOR

It finally cleared, the earth dried rapidly, and we again hit the trail. We were not far from where Roswell is now built, when one day, late in the afternoon, a great cloud of dust appeared, rolling toward us from the valley. Comanches were known to be on the war path and our first thought was Indians. This was apparently confirmed when a puff of wind blew the dust aside, revealing a band of mounted men driving a herd of horses. Indian horse thieves of course! The way that mule team split air for shelter was no bother to them. We landed in a washout, one side of which we occupied as a breastwork and being well armed and good shots decided to fight to the last.

As the cavalcade approached, however, the Indians vanished, as the riders were seen to be white men. You can imagine the revulsion of feeling in the washout when it developed that our supposed deadly enemies were John Chisum himself and a bunch of cowboys, rounding up a herd of cattle to drive to Arizona to fill an Indian contract.

They showed us typical Texan hospitality, invited us to camp with them, and all in all gave us a very enjoyable evening. In Santa Fé and at Fort Sumner we heard vague rumors of trouble in Lincoln County but in the Chisum camp we were virtually at the seat of war. Being strangers we knew nothing of the persons who were freely discussed, including 'Billy the Kid,' who at that time was leader of the Chisum fighting men. We listened to many bloody tales and hairbreadth escapes; so wild and woolly that we both had a suspicion that we were sized up as tenderfeet and a lot was being rehearsed for our special benefit. Later we learned better.

JOHN CHISUM

JOHN CHISUM'S HOME RANCH, PECOS VALLEY, N.M.

McCune was disappointed. Chisum was short-handed and offered him a job as cowboy, but there was nothing doing in letting cattle on shares. After learning my own objective he pointed in a northeasterly direction, saying, 'Doc, over yonder is the Panhandle of Texas, a big country, full of people, an epidemic of smallpox, and no doctor. There's the place you're looking for.'

Mac and I conferred the most of the night and decided to stick together, cross the plains, and investigate the Panhandle.

Next morning John Chisum gave us some good advice, had his boys throw a fresh quarter of beef into our wagon, also a ten-gallon keg as there was one stretch of eighty miles without water, investigated our supply of ammunition which he considerably increased, after cautioning us that the Comanches were then on the war path, and wished us good luck as we pulled out.

CHAPTER IX

INTO THE PANHANDLE

It was now late in November, 1877, and our route, in a northeasterly direction, ran through a perfectly wild country, known on the maps as the 'Llano Estacado' (Staked Plain). There was no sign of a trail. The landscape was rough and broken with stretches of sand and large tracts of mesquite. For probably half the distance there was gently rolling plain covered with grama and buffalo grass with an occasional lake of fresh water containing no alkali.

This part of the country was an ideal grazing district and we were seldom out of sight of either buffalo, antelope, or wild horses. The dry eighty miles we made at night, guided by the north star, or a compass if the sky was clouded. In fact, on account of Indians this was our habitual procedure during the entire journey. At day-break we camped in as secluded a spot as possible. Buffalo chips everywhere made splendid fuel with a minimum of smoke to betray us. Rattlers were not scarce, but as we always slept in the wagon there was no danger from that source. The Canadian River drains the Panhandle from west to east near its middle. On this river, about fifty miles from the New Mexican line, was the village of Tascosa, the only American settlement then in the Panhandle west of Fort Elliott. In 1877 there was no law or order, no organization whatever, not even a mail service, the only government being the gun which every one carried day and night.

There were only three American women in the Panhandle west of Fort Elliott, Mrs. Tom Bugby, Mrs. Charles Goodnight, and Miss Lizzie Rinehart.

We reached the Canadian River at a sheep ranch owned by James Campbell some distance above Tascosa and were made welcome. Campbell was then arranging to go on a buffalo hunt and invited me to join him — an invitation that I accepted with alacrity.

About this time McCune felt that he had had his fill of 'roughing it' and left in the covered wagon for his old home in Iowa.

I needed a pair of boots by this time, but my financial resources were low. When I spoke to Campbell about it, he at once took me to the little store he kept for his employees, fitted me out with a pair, with the remark, 'The valley is full of smallpox and you will soon have all the money you want.'

With an outfit we traveled south fifty miles or so, making camp near the head of a brake with a fine spring for water. Hunting buffalo I found to be wonderful sport. Campbell loaned me a fine horse and, although I have hunted all kinds of game since in different parts of the world, I have never quite equaled the thrills that I experienced in the midst of a great herd of buffalo, mounted on a good horse and with a good gun in my hands.

Campbell's men were Mexicans. He and I would bring down the game and the employees would do the rest. After they had skinned and quartered the animal, it would be brought to camp in a wagon and divided. All the meat was given to the Mexicans except the hump and hind quarters which Campbell retained. Two quarters were impaled on a gambrel and suspended from a cut-off limb of a tree above the ground. Fresh meat could be preserved for some time in that way. When enough to fill a wagon accumulated, it would be sent to the ranch.

In loading these quarters into a wagon it took at least two and sometimes three Mexicans to a quarter. I was a six-footer and at this time a powerful and athletic man, and I ventured some caustic remark as to the efficiency of the Mexicans, which Campbell at once resented. I came back with 'I can put any two quarters you have into the wagon alone,' whereupon Campbell was at once ready to wager that I could not.

My new boots flashed into my mind and I quickly bet to double my debt for them if I lost or Campbell to square it if I won. Done! Stepping up to the two largest quarters that he indicated, I put an arm around each, lifted them from the limb, toted them to the wagon, and threw them in, much to the astonishment of all, even including myself, as this happened to be a new stunt for me. But the boots were mine!

Campbell was considered a good sport, but for some reason he never liked me afterward.

We had a wonderful Thanksgiving dinner at this camp, buffalo, antelope, and wild turkey served in different ways on the bill of fare.

Just before sundown a Mexican rode into camp leading a saddled mustang. Word had gone down the river that a medico was in the country. Señorita Piedad Romero, called the 'Belle of the Panhandle,' the fifteen-year-old foster daughter of Don Casimiro Romero, wealthiest Mexican in the Panhandle, was very ill with smallpox and this mozo had been sent to find and bring the doctor as soon as possible.

Don Casimiro's hacienda was at Tascosa, just one hundred miles away, so we pulled out at sundown, rode all night, and after a short rest in the morning, we kept on till we reached the Canadian River, opposite Tascosa, late in the afternoon. There was an adobe shack at the ford, and as we rode up some Mexicans came out. After they talked with my guide he dismounted and motioned for me to follow him into the shack. I did so and found a Mexican on his back in great pain, which I soon discovered was due to a dislocated shoulder sustained while after buffalo. Having no anæsthetic I pulled off one of my boots, used my heel as a fulcrum, and by main strength reduced the dislocation. Fastening his arm to his body with an improvised bandage, I ordered him to keep quiet and come to me in Tascosa in three days. All this was done by signs, as I could not speak or understand Spanish at that time.

Next morning he grew curious, slipped off the bandage to see if his arm was all right, and at the first motion out it popped again, so he had the pleasure of operation number two. His curiosity was satisfied.

I crossed the river to Tascosa and found the young beauty, Señorita Piedad, a most loathsome object. There was not a spot on her body without a pustule. One of the torments of smallpox at a certain stage is intolerable itching. I racked my brain for something to allay that. There was no drug store in the country, of course, and my stock of medicines was very limited. One thing that was plentiful was gunpowder and knowing it consisted of charcoal, saltpeter, and sulphur I tried an experiment. I added water, made a paste, and had it spread over the entire body. It was a decided success. Señorita Piedad, my first patient in the Panhandle, recovered. Later she married a fine young American, and at last accounts they are still living and enjoying life.

Her foster mother, Doña Solome Romero, a beautiful woman of the pure Castilian type from one of the best families in New Mexico, was especially grateful at the recovery of Piedad, who was her niece as well as her adopted daughter.

On Christmas a dinner and baile were given by the Romeros at their commodious hacienda and Señorita Piedad, now fully recovered, made her debut in Panhandle society. I participated as a guest of honor. James Kennedy, son of the junior partner of King & Kennedy, 'The Cattle Kings of Texas,' was also a guest. His mother was Spanish, and with his athletic physique, dark hair and eyes, he was about the handsomest bachelor in the Panhandle. He was a wild one, so his father put him in charge of two thousand head of cattle with a complete outfit and sent him from the home ranch in southern Texas to the Panhandle with the hope of making a man of him.

Jim Kennedy and I became very good friends and were together so much that we were dubbed by a facetious cowboy 'the roulette twins,' red and black. Both he and Doña Solome were teaching me Spanish, as practicing medicine through an interpreter was rather unsatisfactory, and I was also adding to my 'bag o' tricks' by taking guitar lessons from Miss Lizzie Rinehart.

At first Kennedy conducted himself in an exemplary manner, became very popular, and his father's expectations seemed about to be fulfilled. But, in the course of time he drove a herd of beef cattle to Dodge City, Kansas, sold them and, unable to withstand the temptations of the underworld there, he 'stepped out' and was brought home with a shoulder and one arm all shot to pieces. He never recovered from these wounds, although I think he lived for a year or two.

The plaza at Tascosa was about one hundred yards square and all the buildings were of adobe, or sun-dried brick. The plaza was bounded on the north by the store of Howard & McMasters; on the east by the house of Pedro Romero, a nephew of Don Casimiro; on the south by a blacksmith shop owned by Henry Kimball, assisted by a character known as 'Bronco Jack,' who had at some time met a bullet which crippled one of his legs; and on the west by the store of Mr. Rinehart, who had formerly been a sheriff in New Mexico.

One day 'Bronco Jack' and Benito, a Mexican, had been playing monte, when a dispute occurred and they quit and Jack went back to his work. I stood leaning against the door jamb at Howard & McMasters' store, lazily watching Bronco Jack in the shop opposite where he was repairing a covered buggy. Something attracted my eye and I saw Benito stealthily gliding diagonally across the plaza toward the blacksmith shop, a long bowie knife glittering in his hand.

I whistled. Jack looked up and I signaled with my hand. Scenting danger he jerked out his gun and limped toward the door. Benito was but a few paces from Jack when he came in view. Jack threw down on him ordering him to stop, but instead Benito sprang at him like a wildcat. Jack's gun barked, the bullet passing through the chest muscles of Benito's left side and then between my head and the doorpost, burying itself in the wall behind the counter exactly on a level with my ear.

The warriors clinched in a deadly embrace. Bang went the gun again, and between powder, smoke, and dust raised from the dirt floor by their struggles, they were soon half hidden from view. The gun cracked four more times. Then Benito was seen staggering from a side door, and collapsed on the ground a few paces away. All this took but a few seconds. I ran across, calling to Jack, 'Are you hurt?'

'Hell, no,' he replied, 'but I put six bullets through that greaser all right. You had better look after him.'

Examination, however, revealed nothing to verify this but a flesh wound from the first bullet. Benito had fainted from excitement and the loss of blood from a small severed artery. In a few minutes he was made comfortable on a colchon (wool mattress) on the floor in front of a bedstead in the house of Pedro Romero.

Later it developed that the last five bullets from Jack's gun had pierced the top buggy from five different angles. It was a long long time before Bronco Jack heard the last of 'How about them ar' six holes through that greaser?'

There had been bad blood between the Americans and the Mexicans — the sporting element — for some time and this affair came near being a cause of war between the two factions. Almost before the dust had settled in the blacksmith shop, word went like wildfire through the Mexican settlement that Bronco Jack had murdered Benito. In less time than it takes to write about it, the Mexicans began to assemble, armed to the teeth. They only lacked a leader to begin a slaughter of the Americans, which looked to them an apparently easy matter, as they greatly outnumbered us.

The gravity of the situation was evident and knowing that they had nothing personal against me I took a hand. Assuring Benito and his friends that his wound was a simple affair and not dangerous, I succeeded in arranging a meeting between the combatants and led Jack into the room, crowded mostly with Mexicans, to shake hands with Benito and bury the hatchet. According to the understanding, Jack came unarmed. I was sitting on the bed just behind Benito's colchon, when Jack limped over to it and leaned over to grasp Benito's hand. Just then a villainous-looking Mexican, full of whiskey, pulled his gun and fired point-blank at Jack's back. Fortunately an American cowboy behind the Mexican jerked his gun simultaneously and using it as a club laid about six inches of the Mexican's scalp open so that he sank insensible to the floor.

This lucky blow came at the right instant to deflect the gun of the would-be assassin, the bullet passing just under Bronco Jack's right elbow between my knees and into the colchon on the bed where I was sitting. Two rather narrow escapes within thirty minutes!

I then had another pleasant job, sewing up the villain's scalp!

From the west, two Americans with one horse drifted in and after a few days continued their journey down the valley. The fact that they had but one horse excited more or less comment, as a man afoot in that country at that period was either a curiosity or a suspicious character. Moreover, while they were in town they were rather exclusive and gave little information regarding themselves.

They had been gone but a few days when one of them returned alone with the horse, making camp at the river close by. The L I T Ranch was in the valley west of Tascosa, and Superintendent McCarty, as well as a number of his men, had noticed the two men when they first came through. They all happened to be at Tascosa when the lone man returned with the horse, and at once 'spotted' him.

My headquarters were at the store of Howard & McMasters where I had a room. That evening McCarty, who was a friend of mine, came in and told me this story: They had seen this man come back alone, which looked very suspicious, so they put him through a sort of 'third degree' and as his answers were more or less contradictory and unsatisfactory, they called in a number of men in town and had a regular trial, found him guilty of murdering his companion, and decided to hang him.

The man's defense was that two or three days after leaving Tascosa his comrade was taken very sick and became delirious. When the man who returned awaked from a sleep of exhaustion his partner had disappeared and he was unable to find him. He also claimed to be sick himself, and for this reason McCarty, a very level-headed and considerate man, decided to have me examine him. He urged haste, as the men were preparing for the execution.

We were just in time, as the party was starting for a near-by grove of cottonwoods. I examined the prisoner, at once confirmed his claim that he was a sick man, and suggested that instead of the 'necktie social,' he should be taken to the spot where he claimed his comrade had disappeared and see what could be found, volunteering to be one of the party myself.

My plan was approved and we started at daylight next morning. Besides myself, McCarty took two of his cowboys, one of whom was part Indian and an expert trailer, and the poor prisoner, who was so ill that he had to be tied to the saddle and often supported by a cowboy on each side. He succeeded, however, in guiding us to the camp where we found conditions about as he described. It was too late to do any trailing, so we slept under the stars and at daylight I found the victim all broken out with confluent smallpox.

Meanwhile our Indian made a détour around the vicinity and in a very short time signaled to us he had found a trail. To me it was marvelous how he could follow it, as he was most of the time on horseback, and at intervals would break into a trot.

The trail was a zigzag one which finally entered the mouth of a canyon that was recognized as the property of an eccentric American, Mitchell by name, a sort of recluse, who had married a Mexican woman and had been living here for some years. He was rarely seen and it was generally believed that he was a fugitive from justice.

This canyon was unusual from the fact that although at least a mile wide at its mouth it gradually narrowed toward its head, with steep, precipitous rocky walls on each side, until it was only a few rods in width. Then it turned to the right, and after a short distance it suddenly widened out again and formed an immense natural corral.

This canyon was used by Mitchell to trap wild horses, which were numerous on the plains above. I have seen as many as one hundred and fifty in one herd in the Panhandle. Mitchell and a few Mexicans would find a band, spend from four to six weeks in walking them down, when they could easily be driven to his canyon and into the corral where the old stallions would be shot and the rest broken in by his vaqueros.

We reached Mitchell's hacienda, where we were noisily welcomed by Mitchell's youngsters and a pack of dogs, and on entering found our quest over. The murdered (?) man was there in bed with smallpox. He, in a delirious condition, had been found somewhere in the canyon by one of Mitchell's sheep-herders. He was brought in and tenderly cared for by Mitchell and his wife. They no doubt saved his life, and all this automatically pardoned our prisoner. The unfortunates both remained with the Mitchells and recovered.

Returning one day from a call a short distance down the valley, as I passed the home of Pedro Romero, I was startled by piercing shrieks, evidently a woman's. Springing from my horse I rushed into the house only to see Don Pedro dragging his wife, Doña Refugia, around the floor by her heavy braided hair and at the same time taking his 'daily dozen' by kicking her ribs. I was carrying a heavy quirt with a loaded handle, and having first ordered him to let up, to which he paid no attention, and thinking that he had possibly gone insane, I struck him over the head with the heavy end of my whip and knocked him to the floor insensible.

I realized that I had struck a hard blow and as Romero lay quite still I was afraid that I might have killed him. As I knelt to examine his pulse and heart, I heard a rustle and glancing up saw the Doña, a ferocious expression on her face and a knife in her hand, the blade, seemingly, about three feet long. If I hadn't seen her first, in another second I should have been slashed into ribbons. I had always been considered a sprinter, but I am quite positive I broke all my previous records as I sailed through her front door and onto my horse. This door will be in the limelight later, as Billy the Kid flashed through it, head on, during a foot race.

That was fifty years ago and I can assure my readers it was my last offense as an intermeddler between a man and his wife.

Pedro recovered, mutual friends brought us together, explanations were made and a truce declared; but I was careful never to allow him to get behind me.

CHAPTER X

THE DOCTOR TURNS COWBOY

JOHN CHISUM's statement that the Panhandle was 'full of people' was a mistake. Smallpox soon faded away and there was little for me to do. There were all kinds of hunting, plenty of adventure and excitement, and I was enjoying life, but my income diminished, and it was not long until a debonair young medico, distinguished as the first to locate and practice medicine and surgery in the Texas Panhandle, was in that financial condition commonly known as flat broke.

I was too proud to send home for funds, which would not have been an easy matter anyway as the nearest post office was Dodge City, Kansas, several hundred miles away, and the only communication with it an occasional bull train with freight or Old Dad Barnes, an antiquated old-time cowboy who, about every three months, ambled up and down the valley on a has-been mustang, picking up letters for Dodge City at fifty cents a letter and retrieving answers at the same price. As a solution I applied to W. C. (Bill) Moore, superintendent of the LX Ranch, the largest in the valley, for a job.

Moore was short-handed and took me on. He had a staff of about fifty men, a good part of whom were refugees, many under an alias and a few with rewards for their apprehension hanging over them. This latter class even included Moore, but this was not known until later.

Bill Moore, a Californian and raised on a cattle ranch, was one of the best vaqueros I ever saw. The riata of that day was made of rawhide, and in California, where the ranges were then in the 'wide-open spaces,' a sixty-foot riata was used. In Texas the ranges were broken by patches of brush, mesquite, and timber, and a forty-five-foot rope was employed.

During round-ups Moore would sit back and watch some wild and exceptionally unruly steer baffle every cowboy who was trying to rope him for branding purposes, and after all had failed Bill would put spurs to his mount and dash in. And I never saw him miss.

Later it transpired that Moore had killed some member of his family in California, and fled to Wyoming, where he became manager of a large cattle ranch, and after a time became incensed at a negro employee and killed him. He then escaped to the Panhandle of Texas, where the Bates & Beals Company had recently established the LX Ranch, and after a short period of probation they made him superintendent.

During my sojourn of about a year in that section Moore was probably the most popular and highly esteemed cowman there. Although reserved and dignified with outsiders, he was very cordial and courteous with his own crew. A few years later he moved to New Mexico, west of the Rio Grande, and started a ranch for himself. There were two brothers owning land adjoining his. This land had a fine spring of water that Moore wanted. They refused to sell and after sending them word he was coming after them, he rode up to their home and shot them both down in cold blood.

He again made his escape and was not heard of again. Many years afterwards one of his two foremen on the LX Ranch, Charles A. Siringo,¹ had become a detective, and while after a criminal in Alaska met and recognized him, although he denied his identity. Siringo, who knew him well, was certain he was the man, as Moore had a peculiar cast in one eye which could not be disguised and which can be seen in the picture in this book.

¹ Author of Riata and Spurs, Houghton Mifflin Company.

OUTLAW BILL MOORE
Manager of the LX ranch

My first duty as a cowboy was with a bunch of the boys assigned to construct a large corral. Cedar posts were cut down, hauled from the brakes and planted in a deep ditch we had dug around the outer edge of the corral. I was raised on a farm, where I had done my bit in both digging and chopping, but my hands were now soft and this job produced quite a crop of blisters, the last I have ever raised by manual labor.

Will Rogers, our humorist cowboy, in a letter to a friend writes of a recent visit to the Panhandle and says that 'while at the old corral on the LX Ranch I saw a flock of oil derricks instead of snubbing posts.' If I had only foreseen!

Instead of putting me through the usual initiation handed to a tenderfoot, such as putting burrs under my saddle, sniping me, etc., I was treated royally, doubtless because of the fact that I had treated some of the boys for smallpox and did not kill them.

The senior foreman, Charles A. Siringo, then one of the most expert cowboy riders, ropers, and gunmen in the Panhandle, taught me the tricks of the trade, and a friendship was then formed that was continued to the day of his death in 1928.

Every cowboy is supposed to supply his own outfit. I had practically everything but a riata, and with Siringo as teacher I 'rolled my own.' We took a large cowhide that had been stretched and dried, trimmed off legs and corners until it was circular in shape, and then with a sharp knife cut it into a long strip one half-inch wide, by going around its circumference. After it had been cut into four equal lengths, this strip of rawhide was fastened to a convenient tree or post. The hair was scraped off with a knife and then the strips were rubbed very thoroughly with tallow or brains until they were quite soft. Finally the four strands were braided together in a certain way, one end made into a hondo (loop), and the riata was ready for business.

Siringo then taught me how to throw it, an accomplishment I have not entirely forgotten to this day. During the Filipino Insurrection in Luzon, Philippine Islands, in 1900, I was Chief Surgeon on the staff of the late Major-General Frederick Dent Grant. Desiring to mount a force of his troops, he asked for four hundred American horses and that number of wild broncos from Oregon was shipped to his command. A number of ex-cowboys and men familiar with horses were detailed from the different units, a typical Western corral was constructed, and the breaking of these beasts begun.

One day General Grant and I were sitting on our horses, interested spectators of the performance. An officer taking a fancy to one of the horses had pointed him out to the man in the corral, who had already made several unsuccessful attempts to put the rope over his head. There was a large bunch of horses milling round and round toward the right. The one wanted kept in the middle and when the rope was thrown he would duck his head and escape.

After several misses I made a facetious remark about the roper, and another officer hearing me came back with something like "Tis much easier to criticize than to do."

I was nettled by the tone of his remark. Intensely interested in the scene before me, my memory flashed back over twenty years and I felt an uncontrollable urge to get hold of that rope. Turning to the General I asked permission to enter the corral and try my luck.

He gave me an astonished look, but seeing I was in earnest consented. All this was done on the spur of the moment, and my idea was to ride into the corral, get the rope, and follow my prey on horseback. Being above him I thought I could easily put the loop over his head, quickly wind my end of the riata around my saddle horn, and secure the horse just as I used to do in Texas.

But I had another think coming! As I spurred my mount through the milling circle, it flashed through my mind that I was on a Whitman saddle with no more horn than a muley cow and my entire plan of campaign was changed in an instant. Instead of a thrill I had a decided chill.

Dismounting, I directed the man to hold my horse and reached for the rope. The moment I touched it I had chill number two, and I hardly know to this day just what kept me from throwing up the sponge. I had not touched a riata since I left Texas in 1878, and all my experience there had been with a rawhide, while this rope was hemp. At that instant a typhoon or an earthquake would have been welcome to me, but none came.

The rope felt so different from a rawhide that I knew I should fail and what little courage I had was fast oozing. But there I was, a rope in my hands and the horses still milling to the right round and round. I coiled the hemp in my left hand and with my right began opening up the loop, and to my great surprise it responded, so in a moment my confidence returned.

I stepped about, throwing the loop around my head and backward and forward on the ground a moment, and then began to walk toward the herd. The horse, a fine-looking animal, had kept well in the center in an almost uncanny way all the time, but during the last round he had in some way been forced to the inside and came from my left in full gallop, and as he flew past I gave the twist of the wrist that turned it up and under him in such a way that it caught both hind legs. The next instant I had my hemp around the snubbing post and the chase was over. It was one of the easiest and simplest things I ever did, but it was all due to my streak of luck in his coming as he did from the left on the inside. I owe an apology to my readers, but that incident flashed back from memories of long ago, seems apropos, and is therefore introduced here.

When we had completed our corral, selecting six horses from our remuda de caballos, I became a range rider, being paired with 'Latigo Jim' — the only name I ever knew him by — and located in a small log cabin on Bonita Creek, south of the Canadian about the middle of the south edge of the LX Ranch, which had an area of forty square miles. Range riding means patrolling the boundaries daily, and if any trails are found leading from the ranch, the rider must follow them and bring back the strays.

Our beat consisted of twenty miles, ten east and ten west from our cabin. Our 'chuck' was bacon, sourdough bread, black coffee with sugar, potatoes, and jerked or fresh beef, the meat being alternated at our pleasure with the abundant game. Deer, wild turkey, quail, antelope, and buffalo were all near by. We were both good camp cooks, so we fared rather sumptuously. From the home ranch was issued green coffee. When we had roasted this in a skillet, ground it at the bottom of a tin can by pounding it with the end of a hammer handle, and brought it to a boil in a quart tin pail, we had as fine coffee as I have ever tasted.

Jim had never seen a doughnut. So we saved bacon grease, I mixed the dough as I had seen Mother do, and while I worked in the ~~sour~~ for raising Jim poured in the right quantity of sugar. When it had risen, I rolled out the mass with an empty quart bottle, sliced it in strips, dropped them in the hot grease, and in a few minutes had as nice-looking a batch of browned doughnuts as one could wish.

They looked so good that Jim could not wait till all were fried, so grabbed one and began. In a moment I heard vehement expressions of disgust as he spat his mouthful into the fireplace. In fact he was quite profane. 'If that's a doughnut, excuse me,' he said. I registered astonishment and tried one myself, only to discover that in his haste to help me Jim had picked up the salt can instead of the sugar.

Twice during my tour of range riding we were visited with a severe Norther, each one starting just after dark, and in a short time bunches of cattle all along the line were drifting south with the storm. Each cowboy on the ranch was out on the south boundary doing his utmost to stem the tide and bring back the stragglers, but a good many got away and kept on going.

At night those wild Texas cattle will stampede at the drop of a hat and there are few more dangerous adventures than trying to stop or head them off. The Texas cow-horse is a remarkable animal, sometimes more intelligent than his rider in doing the right thing at the right time in emergencies. During these night stampedes in a Norther, when it is dark as pitch, the wind fairly howling, wild cattle dashing here and there over broken and rough terrain, the way your horse will carry you at full speed, without stumbling or falling, sometimes for hours, is little short of marvelous.

CHAPTER XI

AT THE PALO DURO RANCH WITH COLONEL GOODNIGHT

WHEN the grass sprouted in the spring of 1878, Moore sent a party of eight men, including Latigo Jim and myself, a cook and 'chuck' wagon, in charge of Jack Ryan, south across the Staked Plain to gather up strays that had drifted with the storms. Ryan was the junior foreman of the ranch, a first-class cowman, genial and cheerful in disposition, a good mixer, and just the man for the place.

Going south as far as the headwaters of the Brazos and Concho Rivers, we picked up quite a herd and began gradually to work homewards. After a while we struck a tough bit of country, and while scouting around, picked up the fresh trail of a bunch of horses. We followed this trail, which led into a secluded camp, in which, upon turning a point of rocks, we ran into a camp of four men and saw just beyond about twenty-five horses. Both parties saluted. We dismounted and each began to size up the other. After talking a moment, Ryan recognized the leader of the four, introductions followed, and all were soon chatting and very much at home. They claimed to be on the same errand as we, except they were after stray horses.

As soon as we pulled out, Ryan told us, what we had already surmised, that they were horse and cattle rustlers. The leader was William Nickel, alias Slap Jack Bill, a young man, quite handsome and, according to Jack, from a fine family in the States, but the black sheep of that family. We shall meet him again.

Some of our supplies were getting low, so Jack sent me ahead to the Charles Goodnight Ranch in the Palo Duro Canyon for the needed articles and told me to meet him at the head of the canyon as he came up with the herd.

I was instructed to ride straight north and told that my destination was just one day's ride. So I started right after breakfast without any provisions, expecting to run into the ranch by sundown. But some one blundered, as it took me just three days to reach the ranch. I did not mind it the first day. At night I picketed my horse and with blanket and saddle for a bed I slept under the stars. But about noon the second day my appetite began a hailing sign of distress.

There were plenty of buffalo and antelope, but my horse was not fast enough for me to kill one with a Colt's forty-five, which was the only weapon I had carried on this trip. Passing a big mesquite I heard a whiz-z-z, and as my horse jumped sidewise about six feet I caught sight of an enormous rattlesnake and quickly shot its head off. I sat on my horse looking at that reptile for some time. I had been told by old hunters they were good meat. I was hungry. I picketed my horse, started a fire of buffalo chips, and after skinning and cutting up my game roasted a portion on the end of a mesquite branch spit, and was agreeably surprised to find that the meat greatly resembled chicken or rabbit and was very palatable. I satisfied my hunger and had enough for a couple of meals next day.

For relish there were frequent beds of prickly pear, rather young yet, but juicy and of good flavor. At that time there were fresh-water lakes at intervals along the plains that quenched thirst, and, take it all in all, it was not so bad.

Just before sundown the third day I sighted the walls of the Palo Duro Canyon and before dark I was made comfortable by Colonel Charles Goodnight and his good wife and was treated to one of the most enjoyable meals at their ranch home that I can remember.

When I rejoined our outfit I got a cordial welcome, as Ryan had discovered his mistake in directing me and, to make amends, cut my night watch from then on. When we reached the head of the brakes leading to the Canadian River, we found an ideal spot for a camp. There was a fine spring at the bottom of a steep bank, from the crest of which there lay unfolded before us a magnificent panorama of the entire surrounding country, both plain and valley. The stream flowing from this spring supplied abundant water for our animals.

Here Ryan decided to leave the herd until he reported to headquarters and learned what Moore wished to have done with them. So, leaving Latigo Jim and me in charge, supplied with fifteen horses and a chuck wagon, with instructions to hold the cattle until relieved from the home ranch, he started home with the rest of the party.

Jim and I had taken a tarpaulin and our blankets to the ridge above the spring and there pitched our camp. We had been in this spot one week when a horseman came in from the east with the information that he was a Ranger, that the Comanches were out, and that he had been sent up the valley to spread the alarm.

We found a shovel in the wagon and on this ridge dug a hole about six feet long, four wide, and four deep, filling a bunch of gunny sacks with the earth and placing them all around the edge of our fort. After digging a winding tunnel through which to crawl in or out, we were ready for any hostile outfit that might show up. Ryan had left us two Sharp's carbines with plenty of ammunition, in addition to our revolvers. There was a hole in the tarpaulin big enough to run a fist through, about halfway between its center and edge. So we doubled it over with the hole underneath, and spread it over our fort as a roof, holding it down by placing on top of the gunny sacks a lot of large stones from near the spring. With our blankets inside, we slept there as soon as it was completed. Looking up, we could see the hole about the middle of the ceiling.

We waited about two weeks, and as no word came from the home ranch we decided to make a move. Drawing lots to see which one would go in to headquarters, Jim won. Promising that some one would be out within three or four days, he departed.

I had a big bunch of cattle and fourteen horses to look after, but as the grazing was fine they made very little trouble. The cattle would scatter and graze most of the day, never straying more than a short distance from the little stream, and before sundown I would round them up not far from camp, where they would bed down for the night.

I kept one horse picketed at camp, saddled and ready for use day and night, while the others were hobbled and never strayed very far, except on one occasion. The picketed horse also acted to a certain extent as a sentinel. As a rule, if a strange horse approaches, either day or night, the picket horse will whinny.

I crawled from the fort one morning to find not a hobbled horse in sight. I was a light sleeper, but I had not heard a sound. There were the cattle all right and I could discover no reason for the absence of the horses. Putting some corn in one saddle-bag and bread and jerked meat in the other, I soon found the trail. The direction was south. The horses kept well together and seemed to be traveling rapidly. Thereupon I concluded they had been stampeded, but by whom or what was beyond me. The trail finally led by the bed of a shallow, recently dried-up lake, where the earth was soft and almost muddy in spots and there the mystery was solved.

Tracks of wolves were plainly to be seen and I hurried along.

About midday my horse began to tire. I stopped, gave him some corn and, after a brief rest, went on again.

About two hours before sundown I saw a dark spot on the horizon which grew larger as I approached. I was soon near enough to witness a strange sight.

There were my poor horses lined up in a formation almost as symmetrical as that of a cavalry squad. They were fighting off with their hobbled forefeet two large gray wolves which, snapping and snarling, were doing their best to get a big meal after their long chase. Their appetites were whetted by the smell of blood which the friction of the hobbles had drawn. The wolves were so intent on their prey that I rode within fifty yards without being seen. Then I dismounted and prepared to attempt some killing myself. I was a trifle unsteady after my long ride, the targets were bounding here and there, and, as I did not want to score a miss I took my time, but it was only a moment before I saw my chance and brought down one of the beasts with a shot through his spine. His mate instantly fled, but I had taken an extra cartridge from my belt before I shot and was holding it with my teeth, so was able quickly to send a bullet after number two. I hit him, but did not bring him down. He was running from me and I think the ball went through the muscles of his back, as he wheeled around twice, biting and snapping at himself near the hip. I fired again, but it was a long shot and I think it was a miss.

The horses were in a sad plight. Their fetlocks were a sight where the hobbles had worn through the flesh. Removing the hobbles, I started for camp and, strange to say, they followed me like a pack of hounds, instead of having to be driven.

It was nearly daybreak when I reached camp and, fastening the horses to a rope attached to the wagon, I crawled into the fort and was dead to the world until nearly noon. Something wakened me then and glancing at the canvas ceiling of my dugout, brightly illuminated by the sunshine, I saw projecting from that hole in the under half of the tarpaulin at least a foot and a half of the business end of a snake as large as my arm. It was sinuously weaving about as if looking for a soft spot to drop on. Through the semi-transparent ceiling the rest of its body could be traced from the hole to the gunny sack. Its length seemed to be unlimited.

Harry Houdini in his best days never put over a vanishing act that compared with mine as I fled through that tunnel, nor was any previous training necessary. When I got out, I found the snake had got in, so I stripped off the tarpaulin and shot it. It was about ten feet long, but of what variety or whether poisonous or not I never knew.

As my blankets had been in the dugout for several days, I took them out to air and had another surprise. What I found under those blankets would have gladdened the heart of a Smithsonian entomologist — tarantula, scorpion, centipede, and a reptile resembling a horned toad — quite a happy family, including several other species strangers to me. From then on the fort was 'to let.' Comanches were conspicuous by their absence and I never entered the stronghold again.

It had been a long time since I had seen a newspaper or printed matter of any kind. Rummaging through the chuck wagon, where I now bunked, I found a well-worn copy of Shakespeare in small print and during the rest of my enforced hermit life I consoled myself with it.

After being alone for exactly thirty days, I was finally relieved by Moore himself with an outfit. He gave a number of reasons for the delay, but I was so pleased to see people again I paid little attention to them.

Moore was well satisfied with my care of everything and when we reached the home ranch gave me a week's vacation which I put in at Tascosa. I then took part in the big round-up in which most of the ranchers on that section of the Panhandle participated. The work was hard and exciting, but uneventful, and after returning to range riding a short time I found I had recouped my funds sufficiently to return to civilization. Therefore I quit the cowboy life, and experience I have never regretted, and returning to Tascosa made my home at Howard & Mc-Masters' as before, pending the passing of some party with which I might travel to New Mexico, where I had decided to locate.

CHAPTER XII

BACK IN TASCOSA

JAMES CAMPBELL, my first acquaintance in the Panhandle, came in one day with a small bunch of wild mustangs his party had rounded up, and turned them into the corral back of the store. I had that morning lent my horse to a friend who had a saddle, and while I was chatting with Campbell a Mexican rode up on a burro to get me to go down the river a few miles to a man who had just been shot.

It just happened that there was not an available horse to be found anywhere and Campbell offered me one of his mustangs. He had not forgotten the boot incident, and I instantly realized he hoped to get even by seeing me spilled. Nevertheless, I accepted his offer.

Henry Kimball, the blacksmith, had recently made for me a fine wrought-iron Spanish bit for a new horsehair bridle that had been given me. Taking my equipment to the corral I soon had a handsome white mustang roped, snubbed, blindfolded, saddled and bridled, and let out in front of the store. One end of my riata was round his neck, the rest of it was looped in my left hand.

Removing my saddle-bags containing my instruments and drugs, I pointed him toward the east where there was a strip of small sand hills, figuring on a soft spot to land if I were thrown.

I sprang on the mustang's back and jerking the handkerchief from his eyes gave him the spurs. He pitched his best, but I kept my balance, giving him both spurs and quirt at every jump, and almost before we were through the sand hills he quieted down and became apparently as meek as Moses. To make sure I put him through at a stiff gallop for several miles until he was reeking with lather and then returned for my saddle-bags. There was no one outside, so I rode up to the hitching rail to dismount. After the mustang had quieted down, I had hung the riata to the saddle horn in the usual way, and when I returned to town he was so docile that I let the riata remain where it was, and as I dismounted simply carried the bridle rein over his head to fasten it to the rail.

But the instant my feet touched the ground, he threw a vicious kick at me with his left hind foot and did his best to grab me with his teeth at the same time. My activity saved me from the kick and the Spanish bit from his teeth. I had a firm hold of the bridle rein, and as he then reared up on his hind feet I sprang back and with all my strength undertook to pull him over on his back where I could easily control him.

But alas, my made-to-order nice new Spanish bit broke in two in the middle, the bridle peeled from his head, and away he went at full speed down the valley out of sight. Along with him went my beautiful California full-rigged saddle, a fine Mexican saddle blanket, and my rawhide riata.

The principal topic at the store that afternoon was who was the goat, Campbell or the Red Doctor. Word was passed down the valley, and just one week later the mustang, saddle, and riata were brought in by a cowboy from a ranch fifty miles below. My saddle blanket, a present, was the only loss.

One day later on, a big broad-shouldered man, with a very forbidding countenance, arrived at Tascosa afoot from the west. He claimed to be a sailor and very athletic. He announced he had been told there was a runner there and he was the man he was looking for, as he was ready to run a foot race, one hundred and fifty yards, with anybody, and would back himself for all he had, about one hundred dollars.

The boys came for me, and after sizing him up I accepted his challenge. The course was measured off, judges and all preliminaries arranged for, and we were off. I was surprised to find myself winning with but little exertion, as from his talk I expected a close race. I could never understand why he classed himself as a runner.

He was very ugly after his defeat and began to 'licker' up. In preparing for the race I had stripped down to trousers, shirt, and my old running shoes, a present from Ned Moulton during my University days, leaving my belongings, including my forty-five, in my room at Howard & McMasters'. Clad as I was, I strolled into Rinehart's store and was watching a poker game between a couple of cowboys. A dry-goods box was the table and smaller boxes were used as seats, all in front of the fireplace at the rear of the long store room. I stood with my back to the fire facing the front and only door.

One of the players was quite a wag and we were all laughing at his wit when in stalked the sailor. It seemed to me he was trying to conceal the fact that he had been drinking. When about halfway across the room toward us, he suddenly pulled a gun and began whirling it around his finger. About every other whirl he would throw the muzzle in our direction. My first thought was that he had taken a few drinks and was 'showing off,' but a look at his face, which was demoniacal in its expression, quickly changed my mind.

Involuntarily my hand went like a flash for my gun — and to my horror it was gone. He saw my motion and fired at me point-blank at a distance of not over six feet. What saved me I have no idea. I thought I was a goner and at that instant my life seemed to float before me as I had always heard it does when one is drowning. My thoughts were, 'What a horrible way to die! Without a show on earth! If I only had my gun,' etc.

As quickly as he could the sailor fired again, after which nothing could be seen, as that end of the room was dense with powder smoke. I was experiencing a feeling that was new and one that I can truthfully say I have never experienced since, that of abject fear.

As the man fired the third shot, I realized I was not dead and decided to make an effort to escape. I saw the flash of the third shot through the smoke and it was not directed toward me. Crouching as low as I could, I started with a sort of weaving motion toward the door. September 22, 1927, at the Soldiers' Field in Chicago, I saw Jack Dempsey do exactly the same stunt, except that he crouched and weaved toward Tunney, whilst I was hotfooting away from my man, a move that saved my life.

As I passed him he fired the fourth time, and as I flew across the plaza — in my opinion making the best sprinting time in my career — I heard two more shots. I jumped the counter in Howard & McMasters' store in a short cut to my room, grabbed my gun, and came back over the counter to the door just in time to see my man on horseback disappearing around the rear corner of Rinehart's store. I fired twice before he was entirely out of sight, but never knew whether the shots had any effect. It was at long range for a forty-five, he was crouching low, and his horse fairly flying.

My escape was nothing short of miraculous, but the affair was tragic after all. There were two Mexicans standing at my right also watching the game. When the smoke cleared, one of them was found mortally wounded by the last two shots and he died in a few minutes. Strange coincidence, the two cowboys were also unarmed. They escaped by throwing themselves on the floor and staying there. Rinehart, formerly a sheriff with a reputation as a 'two-gun' man, was behind the counter when the sailor entered and he took refuge on the floor at the first shot, although he had a double-barreled shotgun loaded with buckshot under the counter for just such emergencies.

There was another strange thing about the incident. There happened to be only one horse in Tascosa at the time. He was tied in front of Rinehart's store and was stolen by the sailor as he made his getaway. As soon as possible a party of Americans and Mexicans were in pursuit — I among them — but we never found the slightest trace of the fugitive. He evidently escaped by way of the Canadian River which was but a short distance from Rinehart's and had high banks that would conceal him for some distance up or down. With a start of over an hour and a very good horse under him, he had every advantage in the world.

At another time I had occasion to visit the Bugby Ranch. I had never been there and asked for directions. I was told to follow the trail on the north side of the Canadian River east until I came to a sandy-bottomed creek, dry most of the year; to cross it and turn to the left upon reaching the first arroyo and follow this arroyo to the head where I would find the ranch.

I reached the creek — it was called Sand Creek — late in the afternoon, found it apparently dry, and started across. About a dozen yards from the farther bank my horse suddenly began to sink. Instantly I realized we were in quicksand and that my horse, already weary, would not be able to carry me through. Quickly loosening my riata from the saddle horn I sprang from his back, throwing myself at full length on the sand, and rolled over and over to shore leaving a trail of water behind me. My clothing was soaked. My horse was now down almost to his withers, struggling frantically, and but for the riata around his neck would have perished. There was a log embedded in the sand at the shore, and bracing my feet against it, with the riata wound about my shoulders, I was able to help him in such a way that he finally slowly struggled out. His trembling began to disappear and we started for the arroyo. At first I led him to give myself a chance to warm up, as it was near sundown and quite cold. We soon reached the arroyo and, finding a good trail, I hoped to strike a place soon where I could make both myself and my horse comfortable.

There were many large cottonwood trees along the arroyo and in most of them were numbers of wild turkeys going to roost. They were plentiful all along the Canadian Valley. It was now quite dark and the stars were shining when we reached the head of the arroyo. It proved to be also the end of the trail, which had gradually been growing dimmer for some time. It was a beautiful night, clear and cold, but no ranch was in sight — nothing but plains as far as I could see. Evidently there was a mistake somewhere. My horse was exhausted, I was wet to the skin, and, as the last drop in our bucket of woe, my matches were soaked!

I picketed my horse, and as the grazing was good he was all right. The night was very cold and I was compelled to prance about most of the time to keep from actually freezing. I thought many times of my friend Paist in the blizzard on the Northern Boundary.

Just as the eastern horizon began to get gray I detected in the distance a wisp of smoke curling heavenward and there was no delay in the way I split the air in that direction. The smoke came from the Bugby Ranch, where I arrived just in time for breakfast. Hot biscuit, honey, plum preserves, fried chicken, butter, and cream — the first time I had seen any of the last three articles since arriving in the Panhandle! Years passed, Mr. Bugby retired, and I was once entertained at a dinner in his beautiful home in Kansas City. Although it was a sumptuous affair, I felt constrained to say to Mrs. Bugby that it did not compare with that, to me, memorable breakfast in the old Panhandle.

At this period, when I was riding I carried, in addition to my forty-five, a Winchester repeating rifle in a saddle boot. Returning to Tascosa I avoided the Sand Creek crossing by leaving the trail and skirting the heads of the brakes with the idea of picking up some game. Not far from the home cabin of the LX Ranch, I came to the summit of a slight ridge where a small natural basin could be seen, perhaps fifty feet deep and one hundred yards in diameter. Right in its bottom was a large flock of wild turkeys. They sighted me the moment I appeared and scattered in every direction but mine, running like greyhounds to get out of the basin and take flight. A wild turkey has the same trouble in taking off that airplanes have. They both must run on the level a short distance before they can rise into the air.

The instant I saw them I pulled my rifle, sprang to the ground and opened up. Being somewhat conceited about my marksmanship I aimed my first shot at the head of the bird, but I scored a miss. I then changed my tactics and aiming at their bodies brought down eight fine gobblers before the rest disappeared over the edge of the basin. With my mustang almost covered with turkey, I visited the LX Ranch where both I and the birds were welcome. Moore had a fine cook who rose to the occasion ably. Part of the game I took home and the feast continued there.

As my little room back of the counter was poorly ventilated, I would bring my colchon and blankets and make my bed on the floor in the store beside Jim McMasters, with our feet toward the front door. Jule

Howard had married a Mexican woman and lived in another part of the building.

One night we were awakened by a pounding on the door and voices ordering the doors to be opened or they would be shot to splinters. This was mixed with much profanity and we could hear horses prancing about. Grabbing our guns we sprang from our beds, Jim going to the right and I to the left. We were none too soon, as four bullets came crashing through the doors and the counters just above where he had been lying, my second narrow escape at those very doors.

Jim then did some talking himself as we both opened up with our guns, emptying them in short order through the doors, but the attackers had evidently moved from before the doors as they fired their first volley, and shouting with scorn and derision at our marksmanship they galloped away. They fired several volleys after the first, but none of them struck the doors. Several bullets were found buried in the adobe walls on both sides of them. We never had the slightest clue as to who the night raiders were — probably cowboys we both knew, out for a lark and hunting excitement.

A young bachelor, Mr. Boggs from Boston, had appeared with three thousand head of sheep, driven from the west, and had camped on a range near Tascosa to which place he came for supplies. He was a very friendly chap and everybody liked him. His sheep were another story. A sheepskin has about the same effect on a cattleman that a red flag has on a bull.

Boggs was a good mixer and soon confided his intimate personal history to the cowboys whom he met in Tascosa.

In Boston he had fallen in love with a very charming, and, according to the picture he exhibited, beautiful girl whose parents were wealthy. One day her father and he had a conference. Boggs was asked concerning his finan-

GROUP OF TEXAS PANHANDLERS IN 1884

Left to right, standing: W. S. Mabry, Frank James, C. B. Vivian, Ike P. Ryland

Sitting: James H. East, James E. McMasters, Patrick Garrett

cial status, and after confessing that his bank balance would show but three thousand five hundred dollars was frankly told by the lady's father that before he could hope to become his son-in-law he must show assets of not less than twenty-five thousand dollars. He was also advised that the West was the place to make money.

This advice he took and after investigating several propositions finally decided on sheep. He had bought his drove in New Mexico for a dollar a head. Learning that the Texas Panhandle was a fine grazing country, that there were no laws, taxes, or expenses of any kind but the upkeep of two or three Mexican herders, he decided to become a Texan pro tempore, and here he was.

Personally he had the sympathy of all. But his sheep were decidedly unpopular with the cattle barons. Liking young Boggs too well to resort to force, they determined to get rid of him and his sheep by a ruse.

Boggs traded with Rinehart, and when he was in the store one day four cowboys entered and started a poker game on the old dry-goods box always there for that purpose. It was a lively game and Boggs was soon an interested spectator. He was leaning forward in an effort to see one of the hands when suddenly the player on his right sprang up filling the air with the most horrible curses and after accusing poor Boggs of tipping off his hand jerked out both his guns and opened fire. At the same instant, another player defended Boggs just as vehemently and opened up with his own artillery. The other two joined in and bedlam reigned supreme. Several fell dead (?), Boggs was carried out in a state of collapse, his life saved by a miracle, he was told later. This was of course a blank cartridge battle, the dead disposed of, and blood washed away long before Boggs was back to normalcy. The game was well played and I doubt if Boggs ever suspected it was anything but genuine.

Although the play had been a perfect success and was instantly followed with the most adroit propaganda, that his life was in danger every moment he remained in the Panhandle, etc., for some unknown reason it did not work and Boggs and the sheep still stuck. Another conference was held at Howard & McMasters' and a new plan devised. The next time Boggs came to town a stranger to him galloped in, announced himself as a Texas Ranger sent to notify all cattlemen and sheepmen in the Panhandle that the Legislature had just levied a tax of five dollars a head on cattle and two dollars on sheep. He declared, too, that a force of Rangers would be up the valley, collecting, in a few days, and notified all owners to be prepared to pay in cash.

The next day there was an exodus of three thousand sheep toward Kansas and later word came they had crossed the line.

The Panhandle cattle barons grinned. It was a low-down trick, but if Boggs had not been so well liked, there would have been shooting — and that would have been a good deal worse.

CHAPTER XIII

BILLY THE KID GIVES ME A HORSE AND A BILL OF SALE

ONE morning a small herd of buffalo, doubtless chased from the plains by hunters, crossed the Canadian at Tascosa and stampeded past, a few passing through the outskirts of the village. Miss Lizzie Rinehart, an expert rider and dead shot, owned a fine racing mare, Spider by name, which was saddled and in front of the Rinehart store when the buffalo appeared. One look and Miss Lizzie was in the saddle with her gun, and Spider was showing her speed. She brought down one at the first shot and wounded another before they were out of range.

Later Miss Lizzie married a very popular young cowboy, Robert Russell by name. In the course of time he and Jule Howard, of Howard & McMasters, clashed, and as Jule beat him to the draw Bob was added to the 'Boot Hill' cemetery at Tascosa.

E. W. Parker, manager of the Southern Division of the National Mail Company, Atchison, Kansas, now appeared on the scene, announced the establishing of a Star Route weekly horseback mail line from Fort Elliott, Texas, to Las Vegas, New Mexico, by way of Tascosa, and asked for a guide to escort him through the Panhandle.

A rumor started that he was a detective, and although rumor travels fast this one was slow in comparison with the exodus of cowboys in every direction. Charles A. Siringo, who was then a cowboy on the LX Ranch, says that one even stole a horse to expedite his vanishing.

Being now quite familiar with the valley trails I volunteered to serve as Parker's guide and in this way did my bit toward establishing the first mail route through the Panhandle of Texas.

Our trip was uneventful. Mr. Parker selected sites for stations between Tascosa and Fort Elliott. While at the Fort I was a guest at a country dance given by some settlers in the neighborhood and although a stranger I had a good time. One incident I have never forgotten.

We were in a good-sized adobe house which had for seats wooden benches placed against the wall. One face particularly attracted me, that of a young woman who was a real beauty, with luxuriant wavy brown hair, oval face, low forehead, big brown eyes, and complexion and teeth all that could be desired. Her face and form would have attracted attention anywhere.

Her costume of calico was simple but neat. Yet, although she seemed by all odds the prettiest girl at the ball, she was not dancing. I was told upon my arrival that no introductions were necessary, so I walked over to the bench where the beauty was sitting and politely asked for a dance. Giving me a lovely smile she remarked, in a deep contralto voice almost masculine in timbre, 'I've sot and sot til I've 'bout tuk root, guess I will'; and joined me with alacrity.

She came from Arkansas and was a good partner, but when I learned that her chief amusement was dipping snuff the flirtation quickly subsided.

As we were jogging along the trail on our return to Tascosa, Mr. Parker, after observing me very intently for a few moments, said, 'Dr. Hoyt, if I had your body with my head I would conquer the world.' Was it a compliment or otherwise? Many years after we met in El Paso, Texas, and had some very interesting reunions. His 'body' was better than he thought, as he lived to an advanced age.

Through Old Dad Barnes I had secured a new supply of vaccine and although smallpox had disappeared I was still vaccinating many. Superintendent McCarty of the L I T Ranch entered the store one day as I was vaccinating a Mexican and, as I finished, Mac rolled up his sleeve and took his turn. As I worked he smoked a cigarette and told a story. Just as I finished he turned to look at his arm, and seeing a tiny drop of blood oozing out, fell to the floor in a dead faint.

McCarty was a fine fellow with a high rating for nerve, and rumor said he was entitled to one notch on his gun; but you never can tell. That vaccination cost him a lot of money. The question, 'Don't you want to get vaccinated, Mac?' sprung on him where drinking was going on never failed to be answered with, 'What'll you have, fellers?'

Roy — or Rox — Copeland, a former cowboy, took the contract to carry mail on the new route between Tascosa and Fort Bascome, New Mexico, the latter point being an abandoned fort near the Texas line. After a few trips Copeland was taken ill and I volunteered to help him out. The Comanches were out again and most of this ride was made at night. Returning from Bascome, my mount, a very poor one, made slow time and at sunrise I was still about ten miles from Tascosa.

As I ambled along I met, well mounted and armed, five men whom I had never seen before. They stopped and made inquiries about the location and direction of cattle ranches in the vicinity, volunteering the information that they had heard there was a scarcity of horses in the Panhandle, so had driven a herd of about one hundred and fifty head from New Mexico to sell to the Texas cattlemen. After I told them I was carrying the mail, adios was said and we went our respective ways.

Later in the day this party rode into Tascosa and it soon became known that they were the gang of William H.

Bonney, called 'Billy the Kid,' led by that redoubtable gunman himself. This was early in the fall of 1878 and Billy's gang consisted of Tom O'Phalliard, called 'Big Foot Tom,' Henry Brown, Fred Waite, and John Middleton, the latter a man of middle age who had been an outlaw for some years.

Billy Bonney was then eighteen years old, a handsome youth with smooth face, wavy brown hair, an athletic and symmetrical figure, and clear blue eyes that could look one through and through. Unless angry he always seemed to have a pleasant expression with a ready smile. His head was well shaped, his features regular, his nose aquiline, his most noticeable characteristic a slight projection of his two upper front teeth.

It must not be forgotten that at this period this section was one of the really wild spots then in the Great West. As I have said before, there was not a semblance of government or law in the Panhandle, consequently it was the Mecca for the outlaw, the gunman, and his kind. Billy and his gang, with their horses, which they had collected in New Mexico, camped near Tascosa which, while it consisted only of two stores, a blacksmith shop, and an adobe house, was the center of supplies for the big cattle ranges in the Panhandle.

The news of Billy's advent in the Panhandle spread like a prairie fire. His reputation, with the fact that there was a big reward offered for his capture, dead or alive, was well known, so a meeting of the most prominent cattlemen of that section was called and Billy sent for. He came smiling as usual with as much poise and sang-froid as any man there. He was asked some pertinent questions, and he told his inquisitors that he had learned they were short of horses, so had gathered a bunch and was there to supply them. After some desultory talk, he was informed in substance by the Panhandlers that they knew all about him, but were not looking for him, and so long as he behaved himself they would let him alone. But he was cautioned emphatically that to transgress in any way meant a short shrift. His reply was also brief, that all he and his friends wanted was to be let alone.

For some time Bonney's party mingled freely with all, sold and traded horses with any one so inclined, varying their business dealings with drinking, gambling, horse-racing, and target shooting. Billy was an expert at most Western sports and dissipations with the exception of drinking. Much has been published of his exploits during drinking bouts, but it is my opinion they are mostly fiction. I never knew of his taking a drink of liquor all the time he was in the Panhandle.

To tell the truth, this fact helped to make me friendly with the outlaw, for I was a teetotaler myself. Reared in strict Christian principles, I had never touched liquor.

Billy's men, however, made up for his abstinence. John Middleton was drinking heavily one day at Howard & McMasters' store and began to get ugly, evidently looking for trouble. Others present were in a similar condition and it began to look squally. At that time and place and under those conditions war was fashionable. Peace seemed to trouble men's minds. In this particular instance old John seemed to be taking the initiative, profanely and vociferously declaring to the world just what a very bad man he was.

He had his hand on his gun and during his boasts glared fiercely around hoping some one would give him the slightest excuse to begin hostilities. Just at this juncture in walked Billy the Kid.

In a mild voice that contained, however, a curious note of challenge as well as command, he said, 'John Middleton, you damned idiot, light out for camp and stay there till I come.'

Wheeling toward him, Middleton, his eyes flashing, replied, 'Billy, you'd never talk that way to me if we were alone. You think you're showing off.'

'If that's the way you think just come with me out behind the store and we will be alone,' was Billy's quick reply, as he backed toward the door, hand on his gun.

Middleton's face turned an ashen color, his lower lip dropped, and with a sickly grin he stuttered out, 'Aw' Billy, come off, can't you take a joke?'

'You bet I can,' said Billy, 'but this is no joke. You heard me. Git for camp and git quick.' And old John shuffled out the door like a whipped dog.

Realizing he and his men were on probation, Billy ruled his gang with a rod of iron, so to speak, whenever they overstepped the bounds or attempted to. I saw the Middleton incident almost exactly duplicated one day in Rinehart's store when Billy found Tom O'Phalliard about to shoot down a Mexican he had been playing monte with. In spite of his discipline, however, his men fairly worshiped him and would have backed him with their lives any time it might become necessary.

There were several small Mexican settlements in the vicinity and one of the most popular diversions was a weekly baile at the home of Don Pedro Romero — who has been introduced before — fronting the plaza at Tascosa on the east side.

There was an unwritten law that no one should attend these functions armed and all guns were usually left at Howard & McMasters' store. The Kid's party, learning of these affairs, signified a desire to join in. They were told they would be welcome so long as they complied with the regulation, which they emphatically promised to do.

On a beautiful moonlight night a Romero baile was in full swing. Bonney and I stepped out to enjoy it and incidentally strolled across the plaza, about one hundred yards in width, to Rinehart's store opposite. Returning I challenged the Kid to a foot race to the dance hall. I found he could run much faster than the 'Sailor,' but I led him all the way. As we neared the door I slacked up, while Billy kept on at full speed through the door.

Mexican adobe houses, for some reason, have a threshold about a foot high, and as the Kid flew through, the heel of one of his cowboy boots caught on it landing him at full length on the floor in the middle of the ballroom.

Quicker than a flash his prostrate body was surrounded by his four pals, back to back, with a Colt's forty-five in each hand, cocked and ready for business. The Kid's unconventional entrance was to them an indication of something wrong, and their lightning exhibition of preparedness showed wonderful efficiency of its kind. How or where guns were concealed was never quite understood, but their owners all registered chagrin when they learned they were barred at all future Romero bailes.

Another diversion was draw poker which all indulged in. Some time previously I had won a very pretty ladies' gold watch which Billy admired and wished to purchase.

In a previous talk he had told me about his romance with a little New Mexican beauty, none other than Señorita Lolita whom I had met at Fort Sumner on the Pecos River, and suspecting he wanted the watch for her I made him a present of it, which pleased him very much.

Attached to this watch was a handsome long chain of braided hair. In the picture of Billy the Kid that is shown in this volume and which was taken at Fort Sumner when he returned from the Panhandle early in 1879 — or possibly late 1878 — and no doubt the only one of the outlaw in existence, the two strands of this chain can plainly be seen crossing his shirt-front.

After learning his history directly from himself and recognizing his many superior natural qualifications, I often urged him, while he was free and the going good, to leave the country, settle in Mexico or South America, and begin all over again. He spoke Spanish like a native and although only a beardless boy was nevertheless a natural leader of men. With his poise, iron nerve, and all-round efficiency properly applied, he could have made a success anywhere.

As will be shown later, no less a personage than the late General Lew Wallace thought of him as I did, and also did his bit in an effort to save him.

Late in October, 1878, a Mr. Teats, who had contracted to carry mail between Fort Bascome and Las Vegas, New Mexico, visited Tascosa and I decided to leave the Panhandle and return with him. The day of our departure Billy the Kid rode into Tascosa leading 'Dandy Dick,' a beautiful race-horse, by far the choicest in his entire remuda de caballo, and to my great surprise made me a present of him. I had ridden him several times and admired him, but as he was Billy's favorite I never dreamed he would part with him.

At his own suggestion, in order to protect me in case my ownership was ever questioned, he stepped up to the counter in Howard & McMasters' store, picked up a piece of paper, and rapidly wrote for me a formal bill of sale, just as if it was a purchase, signed it and had it witnessed by the proprietors, probably the two best-known men in the Panhandle at that time.

This paper I have preserved all these years and until very recently claimed it was the only specimen of Billy the Kid's handwriting in existence. My mistake will be disclosed later.

The origin of 'Dandy Dick,' however, remained a mystery. Billy never said where he got the horse. 'There's a story connected with him' was as far as he

WILLIAM H. BONNEY alias BILLY THE KID
The chain across his shirt-front belongs to the watch presented to him by the author would ever get. The old saw — murder will out — is apropos here. In 1921 I once more got in touch with my old cowboy friend, Charles A. Siringo, then at Carrizozo, New Mexico. A correspondence followed and I sent Mr. Siringo a photostatic copy of my bill of sale, which he incidentally showed to James Brady, Court Interpreter at Carrizozo.

The moment Mr. Brady read the description of the horse and identified the writer, he exclaimed, 'My God, It was my father's horse that he was riding when killed by the Kid!'

The horse was of Arabian stock, well known locally as a racer, and had been owned formerly by Major Murphy, of Lincoln, New Mexico, who was one of the leaders in the Lincoln County War. William Brady, 'a brave and honest man,' says Charles A. Siringo, was elected sheriff of Lincoln County and soon afterward 'Dandy Dick' was presented to him by Major Murphy. James Brady had often ridden the horse when he was a small boy.

Toscozo Texas

*Thursday Oct 24th
1887*

Know all persons by these presents that I do hereby Sell and deliver to Henry F. Hoyt one Bay Horse Branded BB on left hip and other indistinct Branded on its shoulder for the sum of Seventy five ($ 75) dollars. in hand received

*Witness
Jas E. McMaster
Geo J. Howard*

W. H. Boney

BILL OF SALE GIVEN BY BILLY THE KID TO DR. HENRY F. HOYT

CHAPTER XIV

LIFE — AND DEATH — IN THE PANHANDLE

WHEREVER I traveled during my pioneering days I observed as a Western characteristic a keen vein of humor, especially along the line of practical jokes. The Panhandle cowboy rarely lost an opportunity to play the 'snipe' or 'badger' game on every tenderfoot that came into the country. There were numerous other 'sells,' but those were the outstanding ones.

For those who may not know, I will briefly describe a 'sniping.' At an evening meal one cowboy will casually ask another if he is going with the bunch after 'snipe' to-night. This remark quickly grows into a general talk about the hunt to take place. Many details are discussed, such as where would be the best place to go, where was game the most plentiful, etc., and during all this chatter the victim is entirely ignored.

His curiosity becomes aroused, he asks some questions, and the answers result in a strong desire to go along. Objections are at once voiced, he wouldn't understand, might frighten away the snipe, might forget instructions, etc. This only makes him keener to go, and finally, after making him swear he will do everything he is told to do, consent is very reluctantly (?) given and he receives his instructions, which are very simple.

Each hunter receives a big gunny sack, its mouth held open with a barrel hoop or bent willow. The men mount and after a ride of some miles into a maze of canyons, hills, and brakes, from which the victim could not find his way back to camp in the dark to save his life, the horses are left and after silently stealing away for some distance the leader leaves one of the men with emphatic instructions to squat behind a convenient rock or tree, hold the mouth of the bag at a certain angle near the ground, and at certain intervals emit a long low whistle.

They are very particular about the exact tone of this whistle and the victim has been practicing it during the ride until he has finally struck the right note and is praised for his efficiency in picking it up so quickly.

After placing several of his men the leader finally sets the victim down in a most inaccessible spot. He is left whistling his little solo and holding the bag, thrilled with ambition to do his part and hoping that the proverbial beginners' luck may strike him and permit him to take back the biggest kill of the party. He is instructed to hold his post at all hazard until he hears two shots, the signal the hunt is over, whereupon he must join the rest where the horses were left. If by chance he misses the way he must then fire a few shots and they will come after him.

The jokers then return to camp and the sequel can be easily imagined. According to Panhandle traditions, a near-tragedy was connected with the 'sniping game' in several instances.

Many years after my cowboy days I traveled forty miles in a buckboard up the Salt River valley in Arizona and during the entire ride was never out of sight of a covey of quail in one direction or another. We put up for the night at a large cattle ranch and during supper the cowboys — about a dozen in number — began to talk about going on a quail hunt that night, just exactly as we used to begin to work the snipe game in Texas.

I was a stranger to all, dressed in city clothes, and it was plain to me that I was sized up as a tenderfoot, and that a game was being put up on me, especially after I had butted in and some reluctance was shown in taking me along.

This opinion of mine was further clinched when the method of the hunt was described: A large plateau some miles away was covered with the Chola cactus, which is marked by its dense growth of thorns. I was told the quail from every direction roosted there at night because the thorns protected them from their many predatory enemies.

Holding in one hand an improvised lantern — a tin can with a hole cut on one side, a lighted candle stuck in its bottom and a piece of wire as a handle — the hunter, by throwing the reflected light into the cactus can blind the quail and approach near enough to knock it from its perch with a small iron rod three feet long, held in the other hand. After this explanation I was more than satisfied it was a frame-up pure and simple and decided to turn the tables by a ruse. I happened to be armed, a fact that was unknown to the cowboys.

It was not a very dark night and as I have a well-developed bump of location it was an easy matter to plan for my coup. The moment I was left alone, with my iron poker and tin can, I intended to sneak out 'Injun' fashion up a draw I had located while coming out, that would land me between the ranch and the boys as they returned, turn my coat inside out and, with a handkerchief mask over my face, step out at the psychological moment and treat them to an old-fashioned 'hold-up.' After disarming them and collecting their valuables I intended to compel them to tie each other up with articles of their clothing and return to the ranch, my fun to materialize when they arrived with the story of their terrible experience.

But, to my intense surprise and, I must confess, to my disgust, the joke was on me after all. We entered the Chola tract, a beautiful sight in the night as it glistens like a veritable lake of silver under the stars, and there, exactly as had been described, were the little birds perched among the branches of the cactus in about every fourth bush. There was little sportsmanship in this method of getting them except that more birds were missed than hit. We had a wonderful breakfast next morning and the story of my aborted joke they thought one of the best ever.

About the time I left Tascosa many settlers were drifting into the Panhandle. The town began to grow and in 1879 one John Cone and a man named Duran opened another store, making three altogether. Surveyors came; Oldham County was organized with Tascosa as the first county seat.

James McMasters, of Howard & McMasters, was the first county judge, Bull Vivian the first county and district clerk, C. B. (Cape) Willingham first sheriff and tax collector. Willis was the first district judge and J. N. Browning (afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Texas) was the first district attorney.

Tascosa was first named 'Atascosa' — Spanish for boggy — because of the treacherous quicksands of the Canadian River bed, but when it was learned there was already an Atascosa County and River in Texas, the 'A' was dropped.

Next came the inevitable saloon, started by Jack Ryan, my former boss on the LX Ranch, and one Frank James, no kin to Jesse! Among their early customers was an unknown drifter, who after a few drinks became ugly and was taken in hand by the sheriff. No jail had yet been built, so the prisoner was chained to a pillar supporting a cottonwood beam in the ceiling of the saloon and left there to spend the rest of the night.

He became thirsty and as the chain was too short for him to get to the bar, he tore up one of his blankets and after weaving it into a lariat, successfully 'roped' one of a number of bottles of brandy standing on the floor at the end of the bar.

Much encouraged, when the first bottle was emptied he persevered, and, when the proprietors arrived in the 'cold gray dawn' of the next morning, they found him peacefully wrapped in the arms of Bacchus, corralled in a circle of empty bottles!

Tascosa was fast becoming a 'wild and woolly' town in every sense of the word. Saloons increased until there were five, and there were several dance halls, the most popular ones being in 'Hogtown,' the sporting suburb of this embryo metropolis of the Panhandle, where 'Sally,' 'Frenchy,' and 'Rocking-Chair Emma' were the reigning belles.

Tascosa now had about everything belonging to a wild west community but a 'Boot Hill' cemetery. Her nearest competitor, Dodge City, Kansas, three hundred miles away, could boast of having planted over eighty victims with their boots on before their 'Boot Hill' cemetery was a full-fledged yearling.

Tascosaites were chagrined over this sad and evidently hopeless situation. Early in 1877 a plot of ground had been selected and fenced in as a cemetery on one of the sand hills near by, but it remained untenanted.

There were strong hopes when the sailor killed the poor Mexican in Rinehart's store, as I have told, but his friends spirited his body away to some place of their own. Some then had an eye on me to help out, having heard that doctors took life so easily, but I disappointed them all by departing for New Mexico, and gloom prevailed.

But at last a ray of light flashed across the dismal scene. A group of drunken cowboys galloped into Tascosa, yelling and shooting. One saw a woman in her yard feeding some tame ducks, took a shot at one of the birds

C. B. ('CAPE') WILLINGHAM (LEFT) AND JACK RYAN

Willingham was first sheriff of Oldham County, Texas, and killed the first occupant of Boot Hill Cemetery at Tascosa. Ryan was foreman on the LX Ranch and Dr. Hoyt's boss and blew its head off, whereupon the woman fainted. Rumor flashed through the town that she was shot. Sheriff Willingham armed with a shotgun went after the gang, meeting them as they rode up to Jack Ryan's saloon for more refreshment.

The Sheriff ordered them to dismount, telling them they were under arrest. All obeyed except the cowboy who had shot the duck. He reached for his gun, but before he could get it into action Sheriff Willingham bored him through with a load of buckshot, and the 'Boot Hill' cemetery of Tascosa at last had a tenant.

The ice was now broken and it was not long until more than twenty-five were laid away on the sand hill, and a Tascosaite could meet and face a resident of Dodge City without blushing.

But by and by a railroad was built through the Panhandle, Amarillo was started — I have actually killed buffalo where Amarillo is now built — the county seat was moved to Vegas, and Tascosa's doom was sealed. Where formerly the main street and plaza of this cow city stretched their lurid way, to-day only a dim outline can be traced through the scrubby underbrush. Of two solidly built lines of adobe buildings not even a vestige remains. The only human being left amidst this solitude is a little old lady with a history.

She is Mrs. Mickie McCormick, all that is left of 'Frenchy,' one of the belles of the old days. Her 'man,' Mickie McCormick, who owned the livery stable of Tascosa, became broken in health and died after spending all they had in trying to get well. According to old timers, Mickie 'was as foine a little Irishman as ever drank a toddy.' 'Frenchy' was an eye-witness of many of the incidents that built up — or rather down — the population of 'Boot Hill,' including what is known as the 'Big Fight at Tascosa,' started by Len Woodruff, formerly a cowboy on the LX Ranch, who finally escaped death after being literally shot to pieces. The row began over 'Sally' and 'Rocking-Chair Emma,' and when it was over 'Boot-Hill' added four new names to its directory — Ed King, Frank Valley, Fred Chilton, and Jesse Sheets, all killed by Woodruff — in self-defense of course.

James H. East — once a cowboy on the LX Ranch, now, in 1927, a retired and highly respected citizen of Douglas, Arizona — was the sheriff at the time of the 'Big Fight,' which took place after midnight, March 23, 1886, and was all over before East knew of it. The men engaged in the affair were widely known and had many friends. Before afternoon a crowd of over five hundred armed men assembled at Tascosa, all siding with one faction or the other. But for the strategy and cool nerve of Sheriff East, backed by his deputy, L. C. Pierce, a war would certainly have started that would have resulted in many more casualties.

Woodruff had been arrested by Sheriff East, the friends of the slain men wanted to lynch him, and it took a lot of nerve and diplomacy to prevent it. Later Sheriff East took Woodruff to Mobeetie, where he was tried and acquitted. He lived for some years after, but never recovered entirely from his wounds.

In those good old days there were two other young 'soldiers of fortune' drifting about in that part of the world, whose early careers were in many respects similar to my own. These were Emerson Hough and Randall Parrish, both of whom later became noted for their writings about the life of the West. Although we crossed each other's trails we did not happen to meet until many years afterward, when a friendship was established that continued up to the time of their deaths. All of Mr. Hough's experiences of the old times, Lincoln County War, Billy the Kid, etc., were imparted to me in conversation as we chanced to meet in Chicago and elsewhere, and I cannot remember them in detail.

In response to a note from me during the World War, Mr. Parrish jotted down some experiences that so nearly parallel many of my own that I cannot refrain from including them.

'My first appearance in that land of young men,' wrote Parrish, 'occurred about the time you pulled out, but it was still sufficiently lively down there in spots. I was educated for the bar, being admitted to practice before I was of age, and settled temporarily in Kansas, at Wichita, when that city had four thousand inhabitants, with an open prairie all around it. As I remember now there were forty lawyers and near-lawyers in the town when I joined the colony. Stood the strain as long as I could, and then joined a cattle party at Medicine Lodge bound for Santa Fé, but left them at Tascosa, and took up cow-punching as a diversion, landing a job with the Merrill & Cassett outfit, either 1879 or '80. Do I remember Tascosa? I'll say I do — you could smell the town four miles away when the wind was right, and when we first rode in we were behind a big cattle party who had cleaned the place entirely out of grub. All we could buy was whiskey and sardines. The next time I was there I came in strapped on a bronc from a cow camp forty miles below where I had been accidentally shot. Every time that bronc got scared and jumped sideways I fainted, but the boys had heard there was a doctor — doubtless you — and were bound to get me there. He was there all right, but was a horse doctor, and he did a rotten job, but got the ball out after a fashion. After I got up I and another fellow started for Las Vegas, by way of Fort Union.

'Got there broke flat, and took the first job that opened — washing dishes in a restaurant of rather unsavory reputation. Confess I did not last long, but began an upward career which included helping to lay the first street-car track in the place, wiping nights in the round house, operating a high-ball game at Raton, and finally landed a fireman's job on the Santa Fé, with a freight-train run from Vegas to Albuquerque. Say, that was a hard one, but I stuck for quite a while, finally leaving to join a bunch of sheepmen, who were intending to buy in southern New Mexico, and drive through to Colorado. That was what brought me to Fort Sumner, and gave me a very slight acquaintance with the Kid. One of our fellows went crazy — very common with sheep-herding — on the trail going down, and tried his best to kill me — would have succeeded if his gun hadn't jammed. We overpowered him, strapped him into a buckboard with the mail carrier, and sent him back to be looked after. Then we went into Sumner along that wonderful avenue of cottonwoods. Where I saw Billy was in the big general store beside the river. It was three days before he was shot, and he sure did give us the look over proper. I didn't know who he was at the time, not until I saw him lying dead later. The night he was killed we were camped seven miles out, but the news reached us. Sumner was very interesting to me, and has always remained clear in my memory. Many of the old post buildings were still standing, and had their old signs up, "Adjutant's Office," etc.

'Our sheep mission failed and I was cast adrift, finding my way to White Oaks, Socorro, Deming, and finally to Silver City, working at various jobs, until I joined up with a party of prospectors. We had all degrees of luck, mostly bad, tramping across most of southern Arizona, and down into northern Sonora.

'It was rather unhealthy there at that time, as Geronimo was on the run, killing anything he found in his way. We had one set-to with him, and lost a pal, and found many a burned ranch home, and several dead bodies. For about two months it was hell in that country. I ended up with mountain fever, and only pulled through by accident. The boys managed to get me into Tombstone, where the Locomotive Fireman's Union took care of me, and when I got well enough they passed me through up the line to Denver. I worked awhile as rod-man on the ditch survey between Greeley and Loveland; then drifted into newspaper work in Denver. Stuck to this line for years in Denver, San Francisco, Omaha, and Chicago, until I began writing and publishing books. Am now writing my thirtieth volume, with nothing very much to complain about. All I got out of the southwest was experience, but I got plenty of that, and have found it valuable.

'A few years ago down in the Ozarks in Missouri I ran across Bill Young, who was night marshal in Deming, New Mexico, when I was there. I remembered him very well, as he had thrown me out of a dance hall on at least two occasions, and we had a nice visit. He is a typical hill-billy, now back on his native heath, and perfectly contented. I asked him what he liked to do best in the world, and he said, 'Fish,' which explains everything. However, he was some marshal in his day, I'll tell the world.

'I was mighty glad to hear from you and wish I had time to write you more at length, and gossip a bit about those old days. Every old-timer is a friend to me — they are getting scarce.'

CHAPTER XV

I BECOME A BARTENDER AND EAT WITH JESSE JAMES

I BADE farewell to my friends in Tascosa, where I had enjoyed many good times and adventures, exciting and otherwise, and where I had also endured at times many hardships and experiences that were far from pleasant. With Mr. Teats I had a pleasant, uneventful ride to Las Vegas, New Mexico, where I put up at the Exchange Hotel on a corner of the plaza in the old town, and began to plan for my future.

The Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway had almost reached the town, which was both wild and wide open. Strangers were pouring in by hundreds, anticipating a big boom upon the completion of the railway. Many of the newcomers were of the sporting and criminal classes.

I could find no opening in my line. The town was full of doctors, and but two, Dr. Shout, of the regular school, and Dr. Cunningham, a homeopath, seemed to be at all busy. The clerk at the hotel became very friendly and began urging me to join with him and a friend, a man of some prominence, in financing a faro game. Las Vegas had been for some time very quiet from a sporting point of view, but the advent of the railroad had put new life into the town and, according to my two new friends, now was the time to reap a harvest.

The plan was for each to put fifteen hundred dollars into the 'bank-roll,' lease an apartment adjoining the barroom that had formerly been used for the same purpose, and engage a professional dealer and lookout, whom they had already selected. The rest would take care of itself.

Although there was a wide spread between this proposition and the Christian training of my early home, I had for two years been in almost daily contact with gambling. I was anxious to make money enough to complete my medical course, and in the end, casting all scruples aside, I 'signed on the dotted line.' The 'roll' I brought from the Panhandle was not enough and I was compelled to sell Dandy Dick and another horse I owned to Mr. Teats, who put them on one of his mail routes and I saw them no more.

For thirty nights our dealer, Scudder, never quit loser and it began to look as if we might rival Monte Carlo. But from the thirtieth night we began to use red ink and we did this steadily until the bank-roll and all winnings that we had not spent had vanished. I was again broke. Doubtless it served me right!

Sophisticated readers at this point will exclaim 'Huh! both whipsawed and double crossed,' but they are mistaken. It was a square deal, on both sides of the table. The real cause of the failure was insufficient capital for the size of the game we were compelled to play. We should have had not less than twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars in the bank-roll to make a success. Although I was hard hit at the time, it was doubtless one of the very best things that could have happened to me. Had we won, the chances are I might soon have blossomed out as a professional gambler.

I had formed a friendship with a young civil engineer, Joel Huntoon, a good fellow from a fine family in Topeka, Kansas, and like myself, in financial difficulty. To reduce expenses we roomed together at the Exchange Hotel. One day he got a small job as a surveyor and hot-footed it to our room to get me to help him on a fifty-fifty basis, as he knew of my former experience in surveying. The job was subdividing a small ranch a short distance east of Arroyo Gallinas (sounds nice, but in plain English is 'Chicken Creek') and now a part of the new town of Las Vegas. We were offered a small bunch of lots in payment for our services, but we insisted on cash. Eventually the lots became very valuable, but we had more need of a little money then than we did of a bigger sum later.

The fee I got was small and did not last long. The hotel proprietor, a German by the name of Weschle, knowing my financial situation, came in one day and offered me the job of bartender, on the watch from noon till midnight, at seventy-five dollars a month and board. When I consulted Joel, who knew I had never tasted liquor and did not know one drink from another, he advised me to take it by all means.

'I'll post you all right so you will have no trouble,' he said.

Whereupon he told me I would never be called upon for more than four mixed drinks in that country, viz., whiskey toddy, cocktail, gin-fizz, and sherry cobbler, and wrote out full directions for the concoction of these.

I committed the rules to memory, tucked the paper up my sleeve for a sly consultation should I forget, and tackled the job. I got on better than I expected, my only worry being a feeling that I might be recognized by some visitor from my old home. I would sooner have faced death any time.

I began work some time before Christmas, 1878. On Christmas Eve a grand ball was given at the hotel and guests came from hither and yon, among them a stage-load from Santa Fé. There was a large crowd in the hotel and I was more than busy. It was the first Christmas in my life that I was not a free agent and I began fairly to hate myself. Glancing up I saw several army officers in full dress, evidently a part of the Santa Fé visitors, enter the room and approach the bar.

As they neared I almost collapsed, for one of the party was Captain Gregory, my commander for seven months on the Northern Boundary Survey in 1873. I did some quick thinking. Under the bar was a pot of blacking for marking purposes and stooping over I grabbed the brush and quickly blacked my red mustache, a successful move, as I could see when I straightened up facing the mirror back of the bar. Some other accomplishments in my bag o' tricks were being able to twitch my ears and scalp at will, and to look at one with a pair of crossed eyes that would have turned Ben Turpin of the movies green. With all these rearrangements of my countenance I faced my customers.

Recognized? Hardly. My own mother would have promptly disowned me had she happened along. I had a good laugh from those who did know me, thinking it was my way of putting over a Christmas joke, and I was glad to let it go at that.

Shortly after I arrived at Las Vegas letters and newspapers from home told me some interesting news. The reader will recall my disposition of the bones of the outlaw Charley Pitts in Lake Como, St. Paul, Minnesota. The lake had frozen over early and a neighbor, as well as lifelong friend of mine, August Robertson, sallied forth after muskrats with spear and hatchet. As he was crossing the lake over the clear ice the corner of a box projecting through aroused his curiosity. Smashing it open with his hatchet he found it was full of bones.

A favorite dog had recently disappeared and by his process of deduction August decided he had learned its fate and passed on. After reaching home he reported the incident to his father who, deducing from another angle, decided it was something besides dog and proceeded to investigate. Cutting into the ice and knocking off the entire end of the box, out rolled a human skull! Sheriff and coroner were notified and an inquest was on. Big headlines and newspaper articles speculated about the horrible murder that had been committed. The bones full of bullet holes — Pitts was shot through the body in five different places — pointed toward a dastardly crime. The police and detective departments were criticized and urged to clear it up and apprehend the culprit. The incident was spread through the entire country by the Associated Press. My brother did not learn of it until the inquest was in full sway, but he then hastened to my uncle, Dr. Murphy, gave him the facts, whereupon he quickly burst the murder bubble and took charge of the bones. As I did not return home when expected, he presented them to a young physician in Chicago, who, if still living, doubtless has a fine skeleton in his office.

The publicity attending this reached Missouri, and my father forwarded a letter addressed to me at St. Paul condemning me in unmeasured terms for my brutal treatment of 'pore charley pitts,' winding up with 'I'll git yu yit.' The writing was almost unintelligible and the letter unsigned.

There was a famous Hot Springs six miles from Las Vegas, equipped with an old-time adobe line of bath-houses and a hotel. Scott Moore and his good wife were proprietors. Their cuisine was noted all through New Mexico and as they always had an extra fine dinner Sunday there was, as a rule, a big crowd on that day.

I rode out one Sunday and found at a corner table the only vacant seat in the room. Glancing at the three guests already there, I was perfectly amazed to recognize the one on my left as Billy the Kid, urbane and smiling as ever. We shook hands, but neither mentioned a name.

We were chatting away of old times in Texas as if we were a couple of cowboy friends, when the man on Bonney's left made a comment on something he said. Whereupon Billy said, 'Hoyt, meet my friend Mr. Howard from Tennessee.'

The fourth man had nearly finished his meal when I sat down, and soon retired. Mr. Howard had noticeable characteristics. He had piercing steely blue eyes with a peculiar blink, and the tip of a finger on his left hand was missing. I mentally classed him as a railroad man. He proved to be congenial, was a good talker, had evidently traveled quite a bit, and the meal passed pleasantly. After dinner we separated and Billy, taking me to his room, gave me, after pledging me to secrecy, one of the surprises of my life. Mr. Howard was no other than the bandit and train robber, Jesse James.¹ I was skeptical, ¹ In the summer of 1928, after I had written this account of my meeting with Jesse James and had told Mr. Harrison Leussler, the Western representative of Houghton Mifflin Company, of the incident, Mr. Leussler informed me that during an interview with the survivor of a well-known gang of outlaws, who now resides in Los Angeles, the one-time outlaw, now reformed, had stated that Jesse James was never in New Mexico and had never lost a part of any of his fingers. The inference was that either my story was a fake or I was mistaken in the identity of the man I met and described.

Although I never claim any great knowledge, I do claim that I intend to be very accurate about any statement I make. Taking into consideration all the circumstances of my meeting with Jesse James, I have always been entirely convinced that it was he without question. The man's statement disturbed me: it meant that if his assertions were true, mine must be wrong.

I left Mr. Leussler to keep an appointment with a friend in a near-by office building. There I had to wait a few minutes. Picking up a newspaper I read of some action at law by Miss Jessie Estella James, granddaughter of the late Jesse James, represented by an attorney with offices in the building where I was sitting.

Making as nearly a bee-line to that office as possible, I introduced myself to the attorney, David H. Cannon, Esq. Mr. Cannon was good enough to give me a card of introduction to Miss James, who received me very graciously, but regretted that she could not give me the information I sought, inasmuch as her grandfather had been killed many years before her birth. When, however, she learned that I lived in Long Beach, she at once gave me but Billy soon convinced me it was true. Jesse James had been in seclusion for some time; Mr. and Mrs. Moore were former friends whom he could trust, so he came out to size up the situation in a new territory. Billy also knew the Moores, and as he had not seen a passenger train since he was a youngster, he had slipped into Las Vegas, discarded his cowboy togs for an entire new city outfit of clothing, and was having the time of his life for a few days at the Hot Springs. He made his purchases at the store of Charley Ilfelt, who also knew him and who still remembers the incident. Mr. Ilfelt spent the winter of 1928-29 at the Hotel Virginia, Long Beach, California, and verified my recollection in regard to several incidents of the old days.

The Moores, finding themselves hosts of two of the most conspicuous outlaws the West has ever known, a letter to her great-uncle, John T. Samuels, half-brother to her grandfather, Jesse James, who had resided in that city for some years.

I lost no time in calling on Mr. Samuels. I was cordially received and given all the information I wanted.

In reply to my questions Mr. Samuels dictated and signed the following letter:

1421 EAST 10TH STREET
LONG BEACH, CALIF.
August 10, 1928

TO DR. HENRY F. HOYT:

I am a half-brother of the late Jesse James. He was not quite six feet tall, had blue-gray eyes, sandy hair, was square-shouldered and walked erect.

When about fifteen years old, he was with Quantrill. One day, while cleaning his cap-and-ball six-shooter, it went off accidentally, tearing off the end of the middle finger of his left hand at the first joint. Shaking his injured hand, he exclaimed 'Dingus' several times very emphatically, and his comrades at once nicknamed him 'Dingus,' a name that stuck to him the rest of his life. I never called him anything else.

I never heard him utter an oath in my life. When the war was over, he joined the Baptist Church at Kearney, Missouri, and was baptized there.

He had a habit of concealing the loss of the end of his finger and very few knew of it.

(Signed) JOHN T. SAMUELS

JESSE JAMES

FRANK JAMES

COLE YOUNGER

brought them together, and they apparently became friends.

Jesse James was prospecting and preparing to make a move, and after meeting Billy and sizing him up made him a tentative offer to join forces and hit the trail together. Although both were outlaws with standing rewards out for their capture, their lives and activities were entirely different. Billy was never a train or bank robber nor a hold-up man in any sense of the word. His only peculations had been rounding up cattle and horses carrying some one else's brand, a diversion more or less popular among many old-time cattlemen, and at that period not considered a crime — if one could get away with it. It was much the same as bootlegging to-day.

His offenses, for which he was now an outcast, were entirely traceable to the now historic Lincoln County War. General Lew Wallace knew this or he certainly would never have made Billy the offer that will appear later.

On account of the difference in their status, and of the fact that a union with Jesse James would carry him away from the magnet at Fort Sumner, Billy turned down his proposal.

We all met again that evening and had quite a visit, 'Mr. Howard' little dreaming I knew his identity. Billy had said I was a doctor who had befriended him in the Panhandle. In discussing different parts of the country I could not resist the temptation to ask Mr. Howard if he had ever been at my old home, St. Paul, Minnesota. He replied in the negative in the most nonchalant manner and changed the subject. It was no doubt lucky for me that he was not a mind-reader. He evidently did not know of the recent publicity that had been given his former pal, Charley Pitts, and myself. It was a case of, 'where ignorance is bliss, 'twere folly to be wise.'

When I was alone with Billy, he gave me a brief account of his adventures after I left Tascosa. He had soon disposed of the few horses he had left and with two of his party had returned to Lincoln County, by way of Bosque Redondo, of course, and found the war still on. If my memory is correct, Henry Brown and Fred Waite left him at Tascosa and traveled east. While at the Bosque, Billy had his picture taken and afterward made his Lolita a present of the watch and chain I had given him. He also told me he had improved his skill with a gun.

In Tascosa the rear of the store was a veritable graveyard for empty quart beer-bottles, and one of the outstanding sports of the cowboys was to set up six in a row and at a range of fifty yards shoot for the drinks, or whatever they might fancy, with their forty-fives. Here Billy was champion. He could pull his gun and demolish the six bottles in just one half the time of any one else. He and I exchanged weapons to see if there was any special magic in the Kid's, but it made no difference. He was also a marvelous shot with a Winchester.

In his picture can be seen the handle of his forty-five with which he shot his way into fame — of a certain kind. The entire gun is shown in another picture with the profile of its present owner, that celebrated delineator of the old two-gun man of the Wild West, William S. Hart, of Newhall, California.

CHAPTER XVI

THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOVERNOR WALLACE AND BILLY THE KID

THE fact of the Kid's return to the seat of war was soon known, and General Lew Wallace, then Governor of the Territory of New Mexico, determined to take a hand himself and see if he could not bring about peace. To this end he made a visit to Lincoln, at the risk of his life, and sent word inviting Billy to a conference; object, a peace talk. Billy came and they had a long conference alone, during which he imparted to the Governor some very important and valuable information about a number of men more or less prominent in the war.

The Governor then made Billy the following proposition: That Billy allow himself to be arrested, the Governor giving his word that if, at the ensuing trial, the Kid would testify exactly to the facts as he had done at that meeting he (the Governor) would not only see that Billy's life was saved, but that he would also be set at liberty.

That was Billy's story to me during our visit. He frankly stated that at first he fully intended to carry out this plan. The men separated with the understanding that the Governor would make all arrangements and mail to the Kid his final instructions. This he did under date of March 15, 1879, giving the most implicit instructions as to just how Bonney should come in. The letter and Bonney's reply follow:

Letter from Governor Lew Wallace to Billy the Kid

LINCOLN, March 15, 1879

W. H. BONNEY,

Come to the house of Old Squire Wilson (not the lawyer) at nine (9) o'clock Monday night alone. I don't mean his office but his residence. Follow along the foot of the mountain south of town, come in on that side, and knock at the east door.

I have authority to exempt you from prosecution if you will testify to what you say you know.

The object of the meeting at Squire Wilson's is to arrange the matter in a way to make your life safe. To do that the utmost secrecy is to be used. So come alone. Don't tell anybody — not a living soul — where you are coming or the object. If you could trust Jesse Evans, you could trust me.

LEW WALLACE

Billy the Kid's Reply to Governor Wallace

SAN PATRICIO

LINCOLN COUNTY,

Thursday, (March) 20, 1879

GENERAL WALLACE,

SIR: I will keep the appointment I made but be sure and have men come that you can depend on. I am not afraid to die like a man fighting but I would not like to die like a dog unarmed. Tell Kimbrell to let his men be placed around the house and for him to come in alone; and he can arrest us. All I am afraid of is that in the Fort we might be poniarded or killed through a window at night but you can arrange that all right. Tell the commanding officer to watch Lt. Goodwin, he would not hesitate to do anything. There will be danger on the road of somebody waylaying us to kill us on the road to the Fort. You will never catch those fellows on the road. Watch Fritzes, Captain Baca's ranch, and the brewery. They will either go to Seven Rivers or the Jacarilla Mountains. They will stay close until the scouting parties come in. Give a spy a pair of glasses and let him get on the mountain back of Fritzes and watch, and if they are there, there will be provisions carried to them. It is not my place to advise you, but I am anxious to have them caught, and perhaps know how men hide from soldiers better than you. Excuse me for having so much to say and I still remain,

Yours truly,

W. H. BONNEY

Sept. 11. 1858
W. A. Wallace

Come to the house of old
Squire Wilson (not the lawyer) at nine P. about nine Monday night alone. I don't mean his office, but his residence. Follow along the foot of the mountain South of R. Town, come in on that side, and knock at the east door.
I have authority to exempt you from prosecution, if you will testify to what you say you know.

The object of the meeting at Squire Wilson's is to arrange the matter in a way to make your life safe. To do that the utmost secrecy is to be used. So come alone.
Don't tell anybody—not a living soul—where you ^{are} coming or the object. If you could trust Jesse Evans, you can trust me.

Lew. Wallace.

LETTER FROM GOVERNOR LEW WALLACE TO BILLY THE KID

P.S. I have changed my mind. Send Kimbrell to Gutierrez' just below San Patricio one mile because Sanger and Ballard are or were great friends of Campbell's. Ballard told me yesterday to leave for you was doing everything to catch me. It was a blind to get me to leave. Tell Kimbrell not to come before three o'clock for I may not be there before.

By the courtesy of Maurice G. Fulton, of Roswell, New Mexico, and Mr. Lew Wallace, Jr., I am enabled to present photostatic copies of this remarkable correspondence.

One letter is written by a cultured scholar and gentleman, well versed in political and military science and governor of a vast domain. The other is from the hand of a beardless boy, yet in his teens, who had not seen the inside of a schoolroom since he was eleven years old, who for five years had lived in close comradeship with many of the most brutal, bloodthirsty, and hardened criminals in the West, and who had become an outlaw himself with a price on his head.

Visualize these two human beings, contrast them, and read carefully the letter from each.

Billy's reply to Governor Wallace speaks for itself in unmistakable terms. As will be seen, he replied to the letter in good faith, arranging details and anticipating contingencies like a trained soldier.

As Billy himself explained to me, this correspondence was carried by special messengers and there was a delay in getting off his reply to Governor Wallace. During this delay Billy's friend Ballard came and told him that the Governor was laying a trap to catch him. Billy, with the idea that the plan for him to come unarmed and alone was an absolute secret between him and the Governor, naturally became suspicious at once. He had had much experience in treachery and false promises and this seemed to be 'the last drop in the bucket.' Instantly changing his mind, he then added the postscript which is, as he intended it should be, ambiguous, as can be seen. But he did not keep that, or any other, appointment with Governor Wallace.

At this time I had never met General Wallace, but when I heard the story in detail I was firmly convinced that Billy had made the mistake of his life in turning down this opportunity and strongly urged him to make another attempt to get in touch with the Governor. His mind was made up, however, and he would not consent to do anything more.

Later I learned from General Wallace himself that I was right. Many destinies in this world are guided or changed by trifles. If Ballard had not come, if the letter had been sent without a postscript, and if Billy had kept the appointment, it is virtually certain his life would have been saved and he might have become one of the useful and respectable men of that country. Many stranger things than this have happened in our history.

When the Kid left Las Vegas, with his usual generosity he presented Mrs. Scott Moore with a beautiful saddle horse. Whether he gave her a bill of sale or not is not known. The chances are he did. I will refer to 'Mr. Howard' later.

The 'Jesse Evans' referred to in General Wallace's note to the Kid was originally a tough youngster, slightly older than Billy, from Silver City, New Mexico, where Billy lived from the age of eight to twelve and where they became chums. Later they became outlaws together and had many adventures. They once met a party of emigrants who fed and treated them well, and later when the emigrants were attacked by a band of Apaches, the two boys came to the rescue with a gallant charge, using both Winchesters and Colts, and doubtless saved the travelers' lives. The affair resulted in eight dead Indians, four wounded emigrants, two dangerously so. Billy came out with a slight wound in his left hand and his partner Jesse with a bullet through his hat.

During the Lincoln County War the two pals split and became deadly enemies for a time, but they finally met and made up. Jesse Evans, however, was fated to die with his boots on, the usual wind-up of men of his class. Billy the Kid lost out on this terminal point by a scratch! He had pulled off his boots on that fatal night, July 14, 1881, when he entered the bedroom of his friend Pete Maxwell, at Fort Sumner, New Mexico, and was cut down by the bullet from Sheriff Garrett's unerring Colt's forty-five. When killed he was twenty-one years, seven months, and twenty-one days old and had the reputation of having killed twenty-one men, not counting Indians.

During my stay of about five years in the Southwest I met many men who knew Billy the Kid and had seen him in action, and they were unanimous in classing him as a man to whom fear was unknown and in time of danger or under fire as cool and composed as if he was attending a social gathering. There were different opinions as to his marksmanship and dexterity in handling weapons. The majority seemed to think his perfect poise and self-possession had more to do with his so-called success than his marksmanship. Even Pat Garrett told me in El Paso, Texas, many years after, that one of Billy's gang, John Middleton, was his superior in every way with a gun. This I doubt, otherwise Middleton would never have suffered the humiliation that I saw, during the incident I have noted, in Tascosa.

My first meeting with Pat Garrett was in the office of the 'Optic' — the Las Vegas, New Mexico, newspaper — while I was bartender at the Exchange Hotel. He was up on a flying visit from Lincoln and was there but a day.

During a hark-back in El Paso, about a year before he was murdered, he told me the following: The late Theodore Roosevelt was President and Garrett had made an application for the position of Internal Revenue Collector at El Paso. Some political enemies sent in a protest containing three specific charges, viz., 'That he could neither read nor write and that he was a drunkard.'

Pat got wind of this and entrained for Washington. He sent his card into the White House and was ushered into the presence of the President. After a pleasant chat, Mr. Roosevelt turned to his desk, wrote something on a piece of paper, and handing it to Pat said, 'Mr. Garrett, kindly read this aloud, and if it suits you, sign it.' Garrett complied, and with the remark, 'Mr. President, it suits me exactly,' attached his signature.

The paper was as follows: 'I, the undersigned, Patrick F. Garrett, hereby give my word of honor, that if I am appointed Collector of Internal Revenue at El Paso, Texas, I will totally abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors during my term of office.'

Wise Mr. Roosevelt. The three charges went into the discard, just like that, and the next day Garrett received the appointment.

CHAPTER XVII

THE ASSISTANT POSTMASTER JOINS THE VIGILANTES

TENDING bar was becoming irksome, but nothing better seemed to turn up until one day Postmaster T. F. Chapman, to my great surprise, offered me the post of his assistant, at a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars a month.

As the Santa Fé Railway neared Las Vegas, the company secured the right to erect an imposing new hotel and bathhouse at the Hot Springs, and this was now completed. Mr. Chapman had leased the property, was going to manage it in person and as this would need all his time he came to me to help him out. The advent of the railway had tremendously increased the business of the post office, which was now doing a money-order business alone of over one thousand dollars a day.

I accepted his offer with alacrity, shed my long white apron for good, threw a kiss at the old bar, and fairly sprinted to the office to resign.

'Vy you quvit,' exclaimed mine host Weschle; and when I explained, 'Vat you git mit de new yob?'

I told him and he exclaimed, 'You stay mit me. I gif you two hundred dollars by de mont.'

I thanked him, glad to know my services were so satisfactory, but explaining that bartending was not exactly my game, I quit.

I was at a loss to understand why Mr. Chapman selected me. To him I was a man from behind a bar, which from the point of view of my upbringing was about as low down as one could get in the social scale. I was a perfect stranger to him; he knew nothing of my antecedents; in fact, he did not even know whether or not I was under an assumed name. In spite of all this, however, he put me into a position of marked responsibility and trust without requiring bonds or other security. It all seemed a marvel to me.

Some months later the mystery was explained. It seems that after I had been behind the bar for a month or so, Mr. Chapman overheard Landlord Weschle boasting in Jeff Reynolds's bank one day that he had a new bartender and was getting about four times as much revenue from his bar as he ever had before. Evidently Joel Huntoon, when he coached me, overlooked one item in the usual education of a bartender, the art of 'knocking down.' It was this that put me in the post office.

One day late in the afternoon Huntoon and I sauntered up a narrow street leading from a corner of the plaza toward a section known as 'the hill.' We had gone but a short distance when we met two Mexicans, one of them dressed in a typical Spanish costume, flare-bottomed trousers, buttons on the side, a short jacket with gilt trimmings, all topped off with a very splendid sombrero.

He was a small man, and as he and his companion passed he gave us a vicious and ugly look, so that I kept my eyes on him and, partially turning, called Huntoon's attention to him by remarking, 'That chap is certainly looking for trouble.' I had seen the muzzle of a gun projecting below his jacket.

On account of an epidemic of crime that followed the influx of toughs and criminals arriving daily on the new railway, a Vigilante Committee had been organized, of which T. F. Chapman was the leader and to which both Huntoon and I belonged. At the same time strict regulations had been issued making it a crime for any one but an officer to carry arms.

Huntoon and I both noticed the gun, and as the Mexican walked with a slight stagger we decided to turn back, overtake, and disarm him, and, as he seemed to be of the better class, escort him home or to his hotel as might be. He seemed to be slated for trouble if let alone.

Just as we started after them they met an old Mexican stone mason, Patricio Ortega, well and favorably known in the community, coming quietly along with his empty tin lunch box on his way home from work.

As they met, the Mexican with the gun staggered against the old man, cursed him for getting in his way, and shot him dead in his tracks. Almost on the crack of the pistol an American sprang from a door at the side of the narrow street with an old-fashioned musket in his hands which he used as a club. With a terrific blow over the head he knocked the murderer insensible. Hardly two minutes had elapsed since our meeting with the Mexicans.

An officer in the plaza, hearing the shot, was on the spot in a moment and took charge. With the help of the prisoner's companion they dragged him to the jail but a short distance away. The doors were hardly locked behind them before a crowd filled the street in front of the building yelling, 'Hang him! Hang him!'

In order to see better, Huntoon and I climbed on top of a high adobe wall at the side of the street. This position gave us a fine close-up view of the affair, and from this vantage we observed an exhibition of nerve not often seen. Don Desiderio Romero was sheriff of San Miguel County. Word reached him of the riot at the jail, and not waiting for a posse that he ordered to assemble and follow him, he came dashing in at full speed, mounted on a superb stallion which he guided with his knees, a forty-five in each hand. He plunged through the crowd until he reached the center of the street in front of the jail doors. Here he stopped and using his guns as clubs backed his steed through the mob until he was against the jail doors. Now he threw his guns down at full cock on the crowd, ordering them back and swearing he would shoot the first man that touched him or his horse or did not put up his gun quick — and guns were not scarce in spite of the regulations. It was certainly a rare exhibition of pure nerve. His voice and face as well as his action indicated that he meant business, the guns in the crowd vanished, and little by little the mob faded away. When the posse arrived, they found him practically alone, but complete master of the situation.

Huntoon and I went to our belated meal with a plenty to talk about and were not surprised to get the tip that a Committee meeting was on at midnight. We were on time and being eye-witnesses gave our testimony. The murderer's fate was quickly sealed. The meeting disclosed the fact that he was the scion of a wealthy and influential Spanish family of Mesilla, New Mexico, and that his name was Don Manuel Barela. He had come from home after merchandise with five big freight wagons drawn by mules. He had completed his purchases; his wagons were loaded and in camp ready to start south the following morning. He had then decided to go into Las Vegas to do a little 'stepping-out' as a farewell.

At midnight the Committee quietly assembled near the jail, proceeded to the door, and knocked. It was opened a little and the jailer asked what was wanted. Mr. Chapman put his foot into the crack, followed it with the muzzle of a forty-five, and in a low tone ordered the keeper to stand back and deliver the keys. I do not know, but I have always felt that the sheriff, knowing the Committee was composed of many of the leading citizens, kept out of the way that night. At any rate, he was conspicuous by his absence. The jailer, realizing resistance was useless and recognizing Mr. Chapman — no one was masked — led the procession to the cell and unlocked it.

Barela had been put in a cell with another murderer, an Italian by the name of Louis Torbillo, who had recently been caught red-handed after killing a Mexican woman, Señora Tomasita. Barela had become conscious, was sober, quickly sensed his visitors' purpose, and began to beg. As his victim was well known to most of the members of the Committee, his pleadings fell on deaf ears. He was taken from the cell, a rope was ready, the noose was put around his neck, and he 'stepped-out' for the last time. A big burly chap — I did not know him — grabbed the rope, jerked Barela from his feet, and began kicking him. Chapman threw his gun down on the big fellow and sternly ordered the brutality stopped. The order was quickly obeyed and the man slunk away under the jeers of the rest.

There was an old unused windmill in the middle of the plaza. Barela was taken there and quickly hanged on one of the wings. After a brief conference it was decided to save a lot of money to the county by serving the Italian murderer in the same manner, and this was at once done.

To Charles Ilfelt, a leading merchant and member of the Committee, whom I have mentioned before, I am indebted for the following further details: Mr. Ilfelt had not been notified of the meeting and was asleep, his bedroom facing the plaza, but he was awakened and through his window saw what was going on. The Barela family were good customers of his and much of the freight then ready to go south was purchased from him. The bodies were taken down next morning by order of the sheriff. Mr. Ilfelt wired Don Mariano Barela, a brother of the victim, telling him what had happened. Don Mariano telegraphed back to 'have good care taken of the remains, buy a good casket, and ship body to Mesilla,' all of which was carried out by Mr. Ilfelt.

CHAPTER XVIII

DAYS OF VIOLENCE

PENDING the completion of the railroad, the Barlow & Sanderson Stage Line still carried passengers and mail daily from Santa Fé. Twice, with but a few days intervening, the stage was held up a short distance from Las Vegas and both passengers and mail robbed. The mail as brought in after these affairs was in a terrible mess. Bags were slashed and all letters which looked as if worth while were cut open. A deputy United States Marshal was put on the case after the first hold-up, but accomplished nothing.

After the second hold-up a conference was held at the post office. Mr. Chapman came from the Springs and the marshal reported with a Mr. Parker, a clerical-looking man with a dark complexion and long black beard, who owned and ran a hotel and livery stable in Las Vegas. Parker stated that four young men — the number that robbed the stage — came to his hotel, rented a two-horse platform spring wagon on each day of the robbery, and drove into the country, returning with the team in a lather and tired out. They had left his hotel, but he was confident they were still in town and was absolutely positive he could identify any one or all of them.

Four men together would attract attention, so it was decided to pair off, and go the rounds of the dance halls, gambling houses, and saloons, meeting and reporting progress at regular intervals. Chapman and the marshal took the lead and were followed by Parker and myself, each with a couple of Colt's forty-fives concealed on his person.

We entered one of the largest gambling resorts on the plaza, and sauntered casually from table to table, Parker apparently carefully scrutinizing every face. At the rear of this long room was a game run by a young man of the 'tin-horn' class, by the name of Webb. I knew him well, as my acquaintance with people had become quite extensive after I went into the post office.

After sizing everybody up, Parker would join me and give the signal, 'They are not here,' and we would pass on to the next joint. This programme we kept up all night long, during which we visited the Webb place a number of times, always leaving with Parker's signal, 'They are not here.'

The next night and for several following this procedure was kept up by Parker and the marshal, until Parker finally gave his opinion that the birds had flown, and the hunt was abandoned. There were large rewards offered for the capture of these robbers. Mr. Parker will be heard from later.

The arrival of every train from the north meant recruits for the underworld and crime still flourished. Page B. Otero, a scion of one of the most prominent families of New Mexico, now a resident of Los Angeles, California, contributes the following account of one incident:

'Four men, known as Tom (sometimes called 'Dutch') Henry, John Dorsey, Jim West, and Bill Randall, came into New Mexico from Texas. They took possession of a cabin in the hills near Mora, county seat of Mora County, and began to live off the country. They made many raids on the near-by settlements, taking by force whatever they wanted. They once entered the old town of Las Vegas and drove off with a new buggy and team of horses, leaving word that if the owner wanted them he should come to their headquarters and get them. This sort of thing kept up for some time, but no one seemed anxious to go after the gang.

'One day about noon they rode into town, tied their horses in front of the Ward & Tamme Saloon, and entering, started drinking. They were heavily armed and strutted around the streets, virtually daring any one to interfere. Joe Carson was City Marshal at this time. The principal dance hall was owned by George Close, and when it opened that evening the four men entered, walked up to the bar, and asked for drinks. They had been drinking more or less all afternoon and were in an ugly mood. Just at this time Marshal Carson entered and, approaching them, asked, politely enough, that they hand over their artillery to the bartender while they remained in the city, saying that it would be returned when they were ready to leave.

'This started the fireworks, and when the smoke cleared Marshal Carson was lying dead in the doorway of the dance hall with seven bullet holes in his body; Bill Randall was on his hands and knees on the sidewalk shot through the abdomen and died that night; Jim West was lying in the street shot through the liver and yelling like a coyote; Tom Henry was unhurt, and John Dorsey got a bullet through the calf of one leg. Henry and Dorsey were captured as they were trying to escape and, with West, were locked up in the old town jail.

'A few nights later the three were taken out by the Vigilantes and strung up on the windmill in the middle of the old town plaza. Bonfires were lighted and most of the population of both Old and New Towns were present.'

It was in the summer time — 1879 — and the weather was hot. Mr. Otero, himself a member of the Vigilantes, with several others, was sleeping out on top of the porch at the warehouse of Otero, Sellers & Company — Mr. Otero's father being senior member of the firm — and from there they could look directly into the door of the George Close dance hall and see the shooting.

Now comes Mr. Lute Wilcox, then owner of the 'Optic,' the leading newspaper in that section, and now a citizen of Denver, Colorado, who gives his picturesque account of the affair as follows:

'During the summer of 1879, at Las Vegas, Dutch Henry's gang of five arrived from the Panhandle to get Joe Carson, the town marshal, against whom they had an old grudge, originating at Fort Worth. Joe told them to lay aside their arms in accordance with the rule. They said they could manage their own guns and needed no advice.

'That night Joe went to George Close's dance hall to enforce the order. The gang was dancing with the 'fairies' and there was a hot gunplay.

'At the "Optic" office I was sitting at my work of getting up copy hook. Mrs. Carson, living overhead in the Gard Building, came running down, stuck her head in the door at the rear, and cried that Joe had been killed, speaking intuitively from telepathic sense. I arose quickly, realizing that something unusual had happened. Halfway across the space to the rear of the dance hall we stumbled upon an object on the trail. I struck a match and Mrs. Carson fell upon the prostrate form of her husband, while I hurried on to get help.

'A large crowd of refugees had assembled, scared out of their wits, huddling in the alleyway and also in an open space between the Close place and Mrs. McDonald's restaurant.

'We packed Joe into Dr. Severson's drug store on Sixth Street, but the man was dead, of course, with so many shots. The Mrs. was hysterical and carried on frantically, but eloped a few weeks later with the Justice of the Peace, Hoodoo Brown, to Vinita, Indian Territory.

'Mysterious Dave Matthews and Dave Rudebaugh were in the mêlée and did much of the return damage to the gang, one of whom had been left outside to hold the horses. His name was unknown to us and he evidently escaped in the darkness. A telegraph operator named Costello, an innocent bystander, was killed and a number wounded, without discommoding the girls other than to give them the customary jolt, which was a part of their business, as Lady Maud and Cockeyed Liz declared. The glass front of the dance hall was demolished in the crush.

'A few minutes later, when we had caught our second wind, with more or less bravado and combate, Colonel James A. Lockhart, now a grocer at Miami, Florida, mounted a box at Houghton's corner near the scene of the ruckus, and proclaimed the spirit of indignation, incidentally a reward of ten thousand dollars in the name of the town for the capture of the outlaws, who sloped away poco pronto, as you can imagine. We all struck out on horses, but the most of us were back empty-handed at daylight. Captain Barney was so eager for that reward that he got away on a short spurt riding a burro borrowed from the Blake kids. The two Daves and the two Pinkertons, Lee and Muldoon, were old-time man-hunters, knew their onions, and kept on going. They found their game ensconced in a vacant jacal below Cherry Valley in Mora Canyon, twenty-five miles or so north of town. The officers were under the cover of an arroyo and threw pebbles against the door of the hut to notify the quartette of their presence. The gang finally surrendered under truce with the promise of safe conduct to the county jail, but nothing more. The officers got back to New Town about 4 p.m. and the news created such a hubbub that we had to get out an extra.

'That night, about ten, seventy-nine of us squeezed one by one into Talbot's darkened barn and held a short consultation, while the livery stock stood by and offered no protest.

'The sheriff was Desiderio Romero, living in an adobe casita on Halfway Hill. We sent our leader, Bob (Red) Old, with two other men, one of whom was Arthur Jilson, and the other an interpreter, to Red's house, a few rods distant, while we remained at the acequia under the hill.

'Desiderio was wise and showed no resentment, but dressed quickly and was brought into camp. He marched in front on our way over to the hoosegow back of the plaza.

'There was a grape arbor leading from the street to the jail door, as you may remember, and Tio Desiderio was given the honor first to enter the narrow trail. He was much perturbed and called excitedly to the captain of the guard of his muscaderos inside to open the puerta, 'and be damned quick about it.' The coverts swarmed in like a pack of hungry chinos at meal call. Doc. Ames, dentist, got the keys from Pine without resistance and opened the door to the farthest cell. The boys soon had the bandits out into the placita. I had been appointed sergeant of a squad of bravatinos to pack out West, who had been wounded in the hips and was unable to navigate. I had my compatriot right there, but we had some delay in getting out, as our man with the others had been chained to the floor. We made a sort of cat's-cradle with our hands and came tagging along with our poor fellow moaning piteously and protesting that he should not be strangled because he was injured. He subsided, however, at the scaffold, when Henry commanded him to 'shut up and die like a man.' Father Coudert from the priory appeared from a side street and making the sign of the cross, pleaded with us as Christian gentlemen to spare the lives of our four victims. No heed was paid to the padre's entreaties.

'You will recall that after the noose committee had done its damndest, and the jerk crew was in action, a shot was fired, as the beginning of a fusillade that followed. This shot was traced to Mrs. Carson, but was not authorized, as it had not been prearranged at the livery, as were all the other details. You will remember also how the stiffes were the next day placed one by one in wheelbarrows and toted off to the carcel after Doc Shout had pronounced them dead. I presume the remains were hid away in the Campos Santos out on the Hot Springs Camino.

'I have only to recite the joke that went with the affair. The merchants on the plaza were somewhat put out by such a bold ceremony right out in front of their stores and held a meeting to declare their objections to such unholy doings. They reported that their well and windmill had cost them six hundred dollars. And now just think of it — they would have to dig up sixty dollars more to remove the infernal thing as a nuisance incompatible with the peace and dignity of the dear old plaza.'

Mr. Otero says the party of two-gun men from Texas that 'started something' in George Close's dance hall that memorable night, consisted of four, while Mr. Wilcox writes that there were five. Next we have the story from Mr. Charles Ilfelt, still living, was one of the Committee, was there in person, and well remembers that the victims of that whoop-er-up windmill party were four in number. I was there through it all and saw the bodies hanging from the windmill next morning as the bus came in from the morning train, and my recollection has always been that there were four.

Naturally, it was a very exciting time. Hundreds of people, men and women, old and young, milled around that ghastly group most of the night, and anything like an adequate description would be hard to give. I have made an effort to get an official report of the details of this affair, but so far have not succeeded. The chances are that records that far back are lost. A few years after it occurred, the 'Optic' offices and all their old files were entirely destroyed by fire. Taking everything into consideration it is no wonder after a lapse of forty-nine years that memory might slip a cog in some detail.

The vagaries of memory under excitement were illustrated in quite a remarkable manner in a noted murder case in St. Paul, Minnesota, many years ago.

A traveling man by the name of Farnsworth was in the lobby of the Merchants' Hotel when a prominent newspaper man, Frank Meade, entered in a somewhat intoxicated condition. They were casual acquaintances, they met and in a few minutes quarreled. The lobby was crowded. Farnsworth was the larger of the two and unarmed.

Meade pulled a gun, a shot was fired, and Farnsworth sank to the floor mortally wounded. I attended him while Meade was jailed without bail. The case was discussed pro and con, and it was learned that at least a half-dozen reputable citizens were ready to testify positively that the two men were from six to ten feet apart when the shot was fired, which fact meant murder if the wound proved fatal.

I notified the county attorney there was no hope of Farnsworth's recovery, so he placed in the next room a deputy, Thompson by name, and instructed me to call him in just before the end and have him take Farnsworth's dying statement.

When the time came Mr. Thompson sat by the bedside and listened to the story of the tragedy. Farnsworth was weak and spoke very slowly. I am methodical by nature, so taking out my prescription book I wrote in it, word for word, his 'dying statement,' in part as follows: 'He was drunk. We quarreled. I saw him pull a gun. We clinched. I grabbed the gun by the barrel trying to wrest it from him. We struggled and as I had hold of the gun he fired.' Mr. Thompson, next morning, dictated to his stenographer from memory the 'dying statement.'

Frank Meade was indicted for murder and was defended by Davis, Kellogg & Severance. Mr. Davis was then an ex-Governor of Minnesota, was later United States Senator, and Mr. Frank B. Kellogg retired in March, 1929, from the office of Secretary of State.

Several prominent men, eye-witnesses of the affair, testified positively that the two men were some distance apart when the fatal shot was fired. Thompson was called, but before he got to the dying statement the manner in which he obtained and recorded it was brought out. Whereupon the Judge promptly sustained the objection of Meade's attorneys, and it was thrown out.

It seems that, for some unknown reason, neither the County Attorney nor Meade's lawyers knew just what the 'dying statement' contained. Both thought it was unfavorable to the defendant Meade. The instant it was thrown out, I realized what it meant to Meade and at once showed and explained my notes to his attorneys. Mr. Davis then took it up with the Judge, I was put on the stand, verified my notes, they were then accepted as testimony, and Meade was cleared.

The decision matters not. I am presenting this incident to illustrate how little dependence can often be placed upon memory under intense excitement. This Las Vegas quartet who had paid the penalty were still at the end of their respective ropes as the bus rolled in, full of passengers from the morning train from the north. I was sitting on the veranda in front of the Exchange Hotel gazing at the gruesome spectacle and wondering what might have been the men's thoughts after they realized their fate. As the bus passed the old windmill on the way to the hotel, my reverie was cut short by a series of shrieks, evidently feminine, from one of the passengers. The driver plied his whip and the bus dashed up to the curb with a woman struggling with a man and screaming, 'Let me go! — Take me home! — Take me home! — I will never live in this God-forsaken country!'

I stepped to the bus, introducing myself to her companion as a physician, and together we carried the woman into the hotel, where I soon quieted her with an opiate. They were a Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Conklin from Arkansas, who, hearing of the new railroad and the rapid development in New Mexico, had followed the crowd. They were a remarkably fine Christian couple, the husband a newspaper man, and one can imagine the shock they both received as they entered the plaza and saw the figures swinging from the old mill. Mrs. Conklin could not overcome the impression the terrible sight had given her and kept begging Mr. Conklin to return to the old home. But being a man of strong character and visioning a bright future for the Territory, he decided to remain. After a short stay in Las Vegas they settled in Albuquerque. The railway was finally completed to that point and a great celebration was held in honor of that fact, Mr. Conklin taking a prominent part. This occurred April 22, 1880, and as I was a visitor there I met the Conklins again.

Mr. Conklin had not found just the opening he was seeking, and told me frankly that if he did not succeed very soon he would yield to his wife's entreaties and return to Arkansas. But fate decided otherwise. A short time afterward, the opening he was hoping for materialized and he became the editor of 'The Socorro Sun' at Socorro, New Mexico, and one of the leading citizens of that place.

The Americans had built a church there and the Conk-lins were welcomed into the congregation. A Christmas festival was held on Christmas Eve, 1881, and Mr. Conklin was master of ceremonies. When the gayety was at its height in walked two well-known Mexicans, Abran and Enofrio Baca, brothers. Both were intoxicated. They at once started a disturbance and became very ugly, so Mr. Conklin approached them and requested them to be quiet. He told them they were quite welcome, but that this was a church and if they wished to remain they must act in a suitable way. They became more violent than ever and dared Mr. Conklin to fight. He reiterated what he had already said and told them they must behave or leave. They finally left the church.

After the festival was over and all had started home, as Mr. Conklin with his wife by his side passed out the door, Abran Baca caught Mrs. Conklin by one arm and jerked her away from her husband and the same instant Enofrio put a bullet through the editor's heart and he fell dead on the church steps.

Although avengers were close after them, the Bacas escaped into Old Mexico. Indignation in New Mexico rose to high pitch, Governor Lionel A. Sheldon, who had succeeded General Lew Wallace, offered a reward of five hundred dollars and the citizens of Socorro a like amount for the capture of the murderers, dead or alive.

Months passed without results, although a proclamation of the reward and complete descriptions of the murderers were broadcast everywhere. Finally in April, 1882, a copy fell into the hand of that fearless and resourceful Texas Ranger, James B. Gillett, who was stationed near the Mexico border in El Paso County, Texas. The two criminals wanted were prominent citizens of Socorro and belonged to one of the best families in New Mexico. In the spring of 1882 an uncle of theirs, Don José Baca, was the judge of El Paso County, Texas.

The story of how the Ranger captured the two fugitives and landed them both in the Socorro jail is full of thrills from start to finish. It is splendidly told in Mr. Gillett's book, 'Six Years With the Texas Rangers.' Abran was captured at the home of his uncle, Judge Baca, and Enofrio at Saragosa, a town in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, about five miles south of the border. The captures were about a month apart, and the second one came within an ace of stirring up serious international complications.

A brother of mine, George L. Hoyt, had settled in Socorro about the same time as the Conklins. One of our sisters, now the wife of George R. Harvey, Judge of the Court of First Instance at Manila, Philippine Islands, was visiting him. When this atrocious crime was committed, a Vigilante Committee of which my brother was member was at once organized.

There was little delay in the justice that was handed to this pair as they were successively landed in the Socorro jail. The Vigilantes promptly attended to that detail with precision and dispatch, although I think it was their first experience in Socorro. One of the brothers was hanged quite near my brother's home, and our sister has never forgotten the shock she received at the sight she beheld upon opening the door next morning.

CHAPTER XIX

HUMORS OF PRACTICE IN BERNALILLO

A MAN named McDonald from Covington, Kentucky, called one day and told me of an opening for a doctor at Bernalillo, New Mexico, a prosperous town in the Rio Grande Valley, a short distance above Albuquerque. There was no drug store and my only competitor was a Dr. Carroll, aged and ready to retire. I decided to go, and after giving my good friend and employer due notice, I began to plan for the new move. I had become friendly with Mr. Herbert, the proprietor of the largest drug business in Las Vegas, so I told him of this opportunity and made him a proposition for him to 'grubstake' me to a stock of goods for a drug store on a fifty-fifty basis. He consented at once. I selected a bill of goods amounting to two thousand dollars and arranged to ship them to Bernalillo by bull-train. As they pulled out, Herbert said, 'How are you fixed, Doc?' I told him. 'Not enough, my boy,' and out came a roll from which he peeled off two hundred dollars and handed it to me. That was the West fifty years ago!

In this transaction there wasn't a scratch of a pen between us — simply a gentlemen's agreement. Moreover, do not forget that my first introduction to Mr. Herbert was when I was bartender at the Exchange Hotel, where he was not a customer!

As bull-trains were somewhat slower than the present-day air-freights, I decided to take my time in starting for Bernalillo by stage. In the mean time my friend Mr. McDonald offered me a seat in his buckboard, behind a span of Kentucky trotters with which he was going to Albuquerque.

Bernalillo in 1879 was a residence town of practically one street on the east bank of the Rio Grande. Its leading citizen was Don José Leandro Perea, rated as the wealthiest and considered the most influential person in New Mexico. He was a man of strong character, but ruled over his vast domain with moderation and good judgment. He had lost his first wife, who had presented him with a number of children, the youngest a daughter of about fifteen. The children were all married but the two youngest, and the old Don had recently taken a rather young woman for his second wife.

Some of the Perea women were beautiful, and all were fine-looking, educated, and accomplished. The men were of medium size, very agreeable, and with courteous manners. In addition to the Pereas, Bernalillo was also the home of branches of the Armijos, Oteros, Montoyas, Castillos, and other old families, all of whom prided themselves on their pure Castilian ancestors. Although brunettes predominated, I remember seeing blue eyes and brown hair among both the Perea and Otero families. With few exceptions they all spoke English as fluently as Spanish, having received their educations mostly at Eastern colleges and convents. I lived and practiced my profession among these people until the fall of 1881, and from a world-wide experience since can truthfully affirm that I never have practiced among a finer or more honorable clientèle.

After a pleasant trip over the Old Santa Fé Trail, a part of which I was already acquainted with, Mr. McDonald put me in Bernalillo some time in advance of my stock of goods. I leased a two-room adobe building on the main street about the center of the town, and proceeded to form a 'Get Acquainted Club' of one member.

That club became quite active when I was suddenly stricken with some kind of fever, was put to bed, and old Dr. Carroll was called in.

He at once confided in me that he was not a physician; that all he ever gave was quinine, castor oil, and native wine. This wine, of very fine quality, was made each year by most of the families, from the famous Mission grapes that are found everywhere in the Rio Grande Valley.

Although the good old doctor's drug supply was limited, I found him to be a splendid nurse and I was well cared for. My goods arrived about the second week of my illness and as I had been delirious for some days Dr. Carroll had them stored in my adobe.

Judge McCutchin, his wife, son, and daughter from Washington, D.C., had come to Bernalillo for the Judge's health. Hearing of my illness, they kept me supplied with all kinds of suitable dainties as soon as I began to convalesce, and it was not long before I was in the adobe rooms unpacking and fitting up the new drug store.

My first professional call came one midnight. The wife of one of the most prominent families had been in agony for twenty-four hours. Dr. Carroll had attended them for years, was called, gave her a liberal potion of each of his 'sheet-anchors' without results and a family consultation resulted in their deciding to try out the new medico. I soon discovered the agony was due to an acute bladder trouble and relieved it instantly by a catheterization, a procedure unheard of among these people at that time. The reputation of the 'medico colorado' — the cognomen given me by the Mexicans on account of my red hair — was on a very firm basis in Bernalillo from that night.

Don José Antonio Montoyo was ill with pneumonia. Dr. Carroll informed the family it was a hopeless case and left for Santa Fé to be gone a week. A son-in-law of the patient came and asked me to come and stay at the house and let them know just before the end came, that they might have the priest perform the last rites.

I went to the house and after carefully examining the old gentleman informed the relatives I would stay provided the case was turned over to me professionally. This they quickly consented to do. This was about five o'clock in the afternoon.

I do not remember ever stepping into a Mexican sick-room fifty years ago without finding every window and door closed as tight as wax. Fresh air, especially night air, for the sick meant to them death. If you ever 'step-out' in the City of Mexico after night, one of the first sights you notice is a white covering of cloths over the mouth of every policeman and any passer-by who may be feeling poorly. Another custom in a dangerous illness was a gathering of the entire clan in the sick-chamber around the patient; the nearest female relative sitting tailor-fashion where the pillow belongs, with the head of the stricken one in her lap.

The Montoyo clan was a large one, and as I entered the room I think they were all there. In the face of strong protests I threw open all windows, put on extra blankets, and had the bed moved where the head was near the window with the most air. Don José's wife took the pillow part and a daughter acted as nurse in applying the remedies I had ordered.

Don José had been ill just ten days, and about midnight a typical crisis occurred. His pneumonia was double and the outcome doubtful. Resolution had begun, and as the temperature dropped, his throat began to fill up with the exudate. Being too weak to raise and expel it, he began to choke and get black in the face. His wife screamed 'El es muerto' (he is dead) and fell in a dead faint, as did two other women in the room.

Throwing aside the women who had fainted, I quickly rolled the old man on his stomach, pulled his head back by grabbing a handful of hair with my right hand, then with my left hand and a handkerchief I jerked his lower jaw open, pulled his tongue out, and as I shook his head vigorously with my right, a cupful of exudate was expelled and he gasped. This treatment I kept up in a modified degree for a minute or two, the breathing returned, as did the color, and in a short time Don José was resting easily and eventually recovered. There was great rejoicing among the clan, the only fly in the ointment being, I strongly suspect, with all due respect to the cloth, a little disappointment on the part of the good little French priest, who had patiently been waiting in an adjoining room all night for that last call.

My reason for this suspicion is that when Don José, after his complete recovery, called to pay my fee of five hundred dollars he incidentally remarked that just before he left home His Reverence dropped in as they were counting out the gold — there was no bank in Bernalillo — and my fee was discussed.

‘You are paying him too much,’ said His Reverence.

‘He saved my life,’ replied the Don. ‘I would have gladly paid him twice as much if he had asked it.’

An epidemic of mumps was especially prevalent in the lower town where lived the families of the poorer classes, most of them retainers of the gente fino of the upper town. There is little to be done for mumps except care and nursing, but the patients wanted something done in the way of medical treatment. Every Mexican has a garden, and all raise frijoles (beans), so they can be found in every home. So I emphatically ordered a bean poultice for each and every case downtown. In a few days I had numerous calls and reports of ‘no better.’ I started out and found —? A nice little flat bag of raw beans fastened to each jaw!

It was not uncommon to take a long ride to some out-lying ranch, sheep or cow camp, and find a fractured arm or leg, with absolutely none of the ordinary materials available that I could use as splints. So I would order a panful of adobe mud and use it exactly as we use plaster of Paris and had fine results.

My medical practice as well as the drug business was increasing daily. I secured the services of Jack McCutchin, son of the lady who had been so kind to me in my sickness, to tend the store during my absence, and after I had been in Bernalillo a couple of months I was offered and accepted the postmastership, which went very nicely with the drug business.

It was about this time that I sent for my brother, George L. Hoyt, to come out from St. Paul and help me. After three months I made my quarterly report to my friend Herbert at Las Vegas and sent him fifty per cent of the net profits. At the same time I made him an offer to buy the entire stock, pay him all the cash I had, and give my notes for the balance, in three equal amounts, payable in thirty, sixty, and ninety days, with interest at twelve per cent per annum, the regular rate then. He accepted my offer by return mail, and I took up each of those notes on the dates they were due. Also, as Herbert did a jobbing business I purchased most of my supplies from him from then on, so the deal was not a bad one for either of us.

One day I walked a party of railway officials, ex-Governor Anthony from Kansas, A. A. Robinson, William B. Strong, and two others whose names I have forgotten. They asked for information as to who were the leading citizens that they could meet for a conference. I suggested Don José Leandro Perea and offered to go with them to his home. We went, and after a conference or two, they secured the right of way to build the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad down the Rio Grande Valley. The railway officials showed their appreciation of the slight courtesy I had extended to them by referring to me Contractors Perkins and Somers, who were to build six miles of the new railway through and past Bernalillo, and the call resulted in my services being retained to attend their employees when needed.

They had a large force of men, and as sanitation, germs, and infections were largely unknown then, this contract proved very lucrative to me.

CHAPTER XX

MEN OF DIFFERENT KINDS COME TO MY STORE

SOME miles east of Bernalillo rises from the valley a majestic mountain called El Sandia (the watermelon) and about twenty-five miles east of it is a district that contains in places paying percentages of placer gold. An abundance of water is required to secure gold in this form. For years Mexicans had packed pay dirt on burros from this district to the Rio Grande, the nearest water supply, and made wages.

A mining engineer had examined this property and decided that a feasible process to secure this gold was to dam up one of the big canyons on the east slope of El Sandia Mountain, pipe the water to the placers, and wash out the gold by the hydraulic method, the simplest, most economical and successful method then known when all the necessary conditions were present. This plan was adopted by a Boston syndicate which organized the San Pedro Mining Company and sent out General Ruger — a former army man — as general manager to develop the proposition.

The railway was completed beyond Bernalillo and I had been appointed division surgeon from Lamy Junction to Albuquerque. I was again remembered by the company when General Ruger stopped at their general offices at Topeka, Kansas, on his way out, to arrange for shipping twenty-five miles of iron pipe from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to his mine, and at their suggestion I was appointed surgeon for his company.

With a large force of men General Ruger built an enormous dam and connected it with the placers twenty-five miles away by an iron pipe, ten to fifteen inches in diameter and with a pressure test of eight hundred pounds to the square inch. This was considered quite an engineering feat in those days.

During this construction there was an epidemic of pneumonia among the men, and after losing several cases at the company hospital situated at the dam I decided that the altitude had something to do with it. From that time I had all patients brought down to the valley, a drop of about five thousand feet. After this change I did not lose a case.

The project was apparently going to succeed and the presidency of the company was tendered to General U. S. Grant, who visited the property to investigate. He and his party were taken from Lamy Junction in Government ambulances to the placers and thence to the dam and reservoir. After completing his examination, the General decided to take the train at Bernalillo, where they arrived about three hours before the departure of the daily train for the north. Hotel accommodations at Bernalillo were meager and, as my office adjacent to the drug store was comfortable, the party became my guests until train time.

This was the second time I had met the great soldier. Soon after the close of the Civil War, General Grant with his wife and two of their children, Frederick and Nellie, visited St. Paul. My uncle, Dr. J. H. Murphy, had served as surgeon with General Grant at Vicksburg. When he called to pay his respects to his former commander, I went with him and was presented to the General and family. I had a short but pleasant visit with Fred, who was four years my senior. This must have been in 1865 or '66, and fate threw us together again in 1898 in the Spanish-American War, where he was Major-General and I was Chief Surgeon of his commands for more than two years.

But I have drifted from Bernalillo. General U. S. Grant was very sociable, and frankly told me that his opinion of the mining property was very favorable and that all it needed for complete success was the necessary snow and rain to fill up the big reservoir. His party left on the northbound train.

The next and last time I met the General was as a guest at a memorable banquet given at the Hotel Lafayette, Lake Minnetonka, Minnesota, by Henry Villard, president of the Northern Pacific Railway, in honor of the completion of that road, in 1883. Besides General U. S. Grant, President Arthur and Generals Sherman and Phil Sheridan were also guests at this dinner. Mr. James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway Lines, made one of his first public speeches that evening.

Soon after inspecting the property General Grant accepted the presidency of the San Pedro Mining Company. At once the stock of his company was kited sky high, due chiefly to his name. The moment he learned of this he resigned and the price of the stock fell almost to zero. Eventually this costly enterprise was a complete failure. I never knew why, as I left New Mexico in the fall of 1881, but many years later I was told that coincident with the completion of the dam there were a number of years of almost complete drought. No water, no gold.

A young bachelor, Billy Graves by name, opened up the first hardware store in Bernalillo during the railway construction. He was a New-Yorker, a nephew of ex-Governor Horatio Seymour and United States Senator Roscoe Conkling, from the same State, and as he had a winning personality he soon became popular.

Exposed to a rainstorm one day, he came home drenched to the skin and developed pneumonia. He recovered, and while convalescing came into the drug store one day just as I had received an emergency call. I was alone and, instead of locking up, suggested that he make himself at home and take charge during my absence. Knowing the town was full of tough characters, brought by the railway, Billy replied that he would gladly stay if I would lend him a gun. My only weapon was my old Colt's forty-five that I had carried since I left the Black Hills, and turning it over to him I rode away. No one came into the store. A comfortable couch against the wall, the head near an open window, looked inviting, so Billy stretched himself out and when I returned later, I found him fast asleep. He had put my gun under the pillow as he lay down and when he reached for it to return it it was gone, evidently taken from the outside through the open window.

I felt lost without it, but regrets were useless. A few days after a traveling man from the Simmons Hardware Company of St. Louis came through, and Billy presented me with a double-action Colt's thirty-eight, with a short barrel, a new model that had not been out very long and, as a matter of fact, one more suitable for me than my big forty-five. That gun has been over most of the world with me and I still have it, apparently as serviceable as ever.

I had among my patients Don Panteleon Miera, who, as I learned from others later, was a man with a history. Both he and his wife were among the gente fino and he seemed to be respected and in perfectly good standing everywhere. He was a quiet, reserved person, but if he liked one he could be very gracious and entertaining. He had a strong face, but his eyes were a trifle shifty.

It seemed that in the early sixties there was an almost continual procession of 'covered wagons' wending their way westward over the 'Old Santa Fé Trail' toward the Pacific Coast, and many who started were never heard from again. After months had elapsed friends or relatives often started in search of the missing, and after a long time it gradually became known that many had been traced as far as Algodones, Sandoval County, New Mexico, a small village a few miles north of Bernalillo. Two strangers appeared one day in Bernalillo and aroused a good deal of curiosity. A rumor was started that they were detectives. Suddenly Don Panteleon Miera disappeared, the two strangers proved to be detectives, as rumored, and Bernalillo had the most startling surprise in its history.

It soon became known that Don Panteleon was the leader of a gang of murderers who made a business of enticing travelers into a house at Algodones and, after killing and robbing them, buried their bodies in a deep pit under the building. It was a plan of systematic murder similar to the one carried on by the infamous Bender family in Kansas, led by the daughter Kate.

A year or two passed. Mrs. Miera received word that her husband had escaped and, after many hardships, had crossed the desert through the Indian county, and finally had reached California. He vowed he had reformed and was now a respected citizen, under an assumed name, of course, but was homesick and lonesome for wife and children and begged to be forgiven and allowed to return home. This state of affairs existed for some years, but as time passes people forget, hearts relent and soften, and finally, after many vows and promises, mingled with the tears and prayers of his family, the good people of Bernalillo relented and Panteleon Miera came home. All this happened before my coming to Bernalillo: I knew nothing about it, and in the mean time had become physician for the Miera family.

One day a stranger, superbly mounted, rode into Bernalillo. He had a full-rigged California saddle, was dressed in a handsome corduroy riding costume and armed with a brace of Colt's forty-fives. The Messick Hotel, the only one in Bernalillo, was next to my store and office and my brother and I took our meals there. The stranger was seated at our table and opened a conversation by inquiring if I knew where he could get a guide to a small town about forty miles east of El Sandia Mountain. I replied by naming a stalwart young Mexican, Máriño Lebya by name, a fine horseman and one who knew the country in every direction.

Marino was sent for, satisfactory arrangements made, and the next morning they started early. Several months elapsed and several men successively stopped over at Bernalillo, made inquiries about various matters, and went their way. Later, another appeared, and entering my store asked for the postmaster. I happened to be making up the mail for the next train, so identified myself, whereupon he asked to see me privately.

Entering my office he showed me his credentials as a Government secret-service man, and swearing me to secrecy stated that a Government official on special business in that section had disappeared some months previously. He had been traced to Bernalillo, where his trail seemed to stop. I asked for his description and he handed me a photograph of a man whom I instantly recognized as the one I had turned over to Marino. A still hunt was on at once for Marino, the young Mexican, but it was learned he had not been in Bernalillo for some time.

The detective went to Albuquerque, where he found in a pawn shop a fine gold watch and chain that belonged to the man who had disappeared. Following this and other clues a searching party was sent over the mountain trail the men were supposed to have taken and they found that Marino had led him into an ambush, where he was murdered. After taking his valuables, the murderers had covered the body with a pile of logs, set them afire, reducing to ashes everything except a half-dozen metal military buttons that were on his vest. These, and other clues, resulted in tracing the crime to an organized gang. And to the astonishment of all, Panteleon Miera was their leader!

This investigation was carried on with skill and secrecy and in such a way that not a suspicion was aroused in the minds of the guilty.

A short time before this secret-service man came to me, Panteleon entered my store one morning and presented me with a beautiful Navajo saddle blanket, which I have kept all these years and which adorns a couch by my side as I write. He knew I was very fond of fine horses, and when he gave me the blanket he said, 'This is only the ante. The first time I go to my ranch I bring you the best horse and saddle I own.'

In thanking him I remarked, 'I hope, Panteleon, you won't fall dead before you fill the hand.' I have always regretted that the detective did not arrive a month later!

The discovery of the outrageous crime created intense excitement in Bernalillo. During the day Panteleon and one of his men, almost a dwarf in stature, had been seized and thrown into the calaboose back of the Alcalde's home just across the street from my office. The word was passed around to assemble that night at a big warehouse near the railway depot and nearly one hundred responded.

Details were quietly discussed. Then the meeting adjourned to the calaboose and the final act in Don Panteleon's career was brought to a close. In front of the Alcalde's house stood a stately cottonwood, the trunk of which divided into two branches about fifteen feet from the ground. A dry-goods box was placed on each side of the tree and a lariat was thrown between the two forks with each end suspended over a box. The two murderers were then brought out, one placed on each of the boxes, and the ends of the lariat properly fastened around their respective necks.

The dwarf was agonized with fear and begged hard for his life. Panteleon sneered at his pleadings, and in a strong, clear, and steady voice sang his death song as boastingly as the old-time American Indians we read about. He declared that he had killed over two hundred Americans during his career and was proud of it.

The knots were tied, the boxes jerked away, and his song was silenced forever.

There were seven men in Panteleon's band, including himself. Four of them were captured by Don Perfecto Armijo, sheriff of Bernalillo County and stationed at Albuquerque. They were incarcerated in the jail at that place and later taken out and given the same punishment that their leader and comrade had received. The seventh was the Marino Lebya whom I had introduced to the murdered officer, and strange to say he eluded all kinds of traps and efforts to apprehend him and for some years was not heard of. There was, of course, a big standing reward for his capture.

I never knew his fate until a short time ago I ran across in a public library Mr. Charles F. Lummis's book 'A Tramp Across the Continent' — a very interesting narrative by the way — which tells of this murder and says that after Lebya escaped to the mountains he organized a band of outlaws which he handled for some years, but cupidity finally won and he was killed for the reward by two of his own band, as Bob Ford killed Jesse James.

CHAPTER XXI

I TESTIFY IN COURT AND CALL ON THE GOVERNOR

IN Messick's Hotel in Bernalillo I met one day a stranger who told me of a man he, as a lawyer, was defending at Santa Fé. The man had been tried and convicted and was awaiting sentence. The attorney said he believed his client innocent and was on the way to Arizona for an important witness for the defense. In reply to my questions he said that the man's name was Webb and that he was accused of robbing passengers and mail from a stage-coach near Las Vegas, New Mexico, some time before.

This sounded familiar, so I at once identified myself and told him the story of Webb of Las Vegas, and of Parker's hunt with me, and learned that it was the testimony of this very man Parker that had convicted Webb. My story pleased the attorney beyond words. It was evidently a case of railroading an innocent man to prison for a reward. The penalty then for robbery of stage and U.S. Mail was imprisonment for life. Enjoining silence the lawyer left for Santa Fé, made a motion for a new trial, which was granted, and in a few days I received a subpoena to appear at court in Santa Fé. Webb's attorney, whose name I cannot remember, had carefully camouflaged details of the new evidence and my identity, but it was rumored that a sensation was coming. As a result the courtroom was crowded.

I did not enter until court had convened and took a back seat in the crowd where I could listen to the testimony. Parker was the star witness for the prosecution. He was a fine-looking man, and with his long beard, black broadcloth suit, and strong features, could easily be taken for a typical Mormon bishop. He positively identified poor Webb as the man who hired his team on the two occasions of the hold-up of the stage and described the condition of the horses when returned reeking with sweat. He was followed by the driver of the stage during the second robbery, who testified that the outlaws were masked, but that he saw the horses and wagon among the trees not far away and later identified them at Parker's livery stable.

While Parker was on the stand, a gentleman entered and as he stepped toward the front was saluted by the Judge and invited to a seat by his side. It proved to be the Governor, General Lew Wallace. This was the first time I had ever seen him.

The prosecution rested, and Dr. Henry F. Hoyt was called to the stand. A good many years have elapsed, but I can still visualize Mr. Parker. We were but a few feet apart, facing each other. His black eyes flashed fire; he glared at me like a wolf at bay, while his face slowly turned to an ashen gray. If a look could kill I should have perished right there.

After the preliminary questions were completed, I was asked to describe in my own way just what occurred in Las Vegas the night of the second robbery of the stage and mail. As the high spots of this story have already been described, I will not repeat them.

Webb's attorney, for reasons, had not even disclosed to his client my coming into the case, so I was as much a surprise to him as I was to Parker. Several times during the course of my testimony I had glanced at him and saw tears trickling down the poor fellow's face. I could imagine his feelings at seeing the life sentence to prison apparently fading away.

Upon completion of my direct testimony, I was naturally subjected to a most vicious cross-examination, but I had only told the truth and most of the prosecuting attorney's attacks were boomerangs. I was a tyro then as a witness — in fact, it was my first experience. Since that time I have been on the stand in court a great many times in all kinds of cases and I have never seen a cross-examination break down true testimony.

Before I left the stand the Judge himself took a hand. He had evidently observed the change in Parker's demeanor after I appeared on the scene.

The Judge: 'Dr. Hoyt, you have testified that you knew Mr. Parker in Las Vegas. What was his general reputation there for truth and veracity?'

Dr. Hoyt: 'Your Honor, my personal acquaintance with Mr. Parker in Las Vegas was limited to the night when we were together as I have testified. I do not recall ever discussing his character with any one. But I listened to every word of his testimony here this morning and, judging him from what I heard, I would not believe him under oath. His testimony was absolutely false.'

More vicious looks shot from Parker and a deputy United States marshal who sat beside him and who, I afterward learned, was also interested in winning the big reward for the capture and conviction of any of the robbers. I do not think the prosecuting attorney was mixed up with it in any way.

The Judge then charged the jury, who brought in a verdict of 'Not guilty.' From the unanimous demonstration of approval by the audience it was very apparent that Webb had their sympathy.

As court adjourned I was introduced to General Wallace by the Judge and was heartily congratulated by him for my testimony. As I was pushing through the assemblage toward the front door which opened onto the plaza, some one caught me by the arm and pulling me in another direction, whispered, 'Come this way for God's sake, quick!'

I turned, and it was the Mr. Teats who had the 'star route' contract for carrying United States mail from Fort Bascome, New Mexico, to Las Vegas, and whose vouchers I had signed when I had charge of the post office at Las Vegas. He jerked me through the crowd to a side door into another room, thence through a back door into a sort of corral in the rear of the courthouse, eventually landing me in a back street, where he explained.

He said that Parker and the deputy marshal were so furious at me that they had arranged with a couple of Mexican 'knife men' to stab me from both sides as I emerged from the courtroom door. Fortunately Teats had one of his Mexican mail-riders with him, who overheard the plot and informed him at once. It was doubtless as narrow an escape as I ever had. Although I had a gun and knew how to use it, they would have struck me from behind and I should have had little chance to defend myself.

Modern readers may think this incident rather improbable, but if they will dig up some of the history of New Mexico at that period they will not wonder at the story. They will find records of many killings for less provocation than I gave.

I learned recently from some old-timer that my friend Teats was still living in New Mexico. If he should read this, I hope he will communicate with me. For a hark-back with him I would go a long way.

At first I was for going at once to the Judge to see if the villains could not be rounded up, but after discussing the pros and cons with Teats I decided to drop it. No real harm had been done and to give publicity to the affair would no doubt jeopardize his rider, so we left well enough alone.

When I arrived in Santa Fé I was surprised to learn that Billy the Kid had been captured and was in the Santa Fé jail. News was not broadcast then as now. So I called on General Wallace at the Palace, told him of our former friendship, and asked for a pass to the jail that I might visit Billy. He sent for United States Marshal John Sherman, Jr., who went with me himself and left me with the Kid as long as I wished to stay.

Before leaving, the marshal called my attention to a pair of shackles he had had made to order, not caring to take any chances with his resourceful prisoner. They were attached to Billy's ankles. They weighed fifteen pounds each and were made of the hardest steel known, connected to a short heavy chain and fastened with a Yale lock. He seemed quite proud of them, and boasted that there was no danger of losing his man with that brand of jewelry worn. Billy, with his usual smile, came back with 'There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip, John!'

We had a long visit. Except for his irons he was much more comfortable than he had been for years. His life had been little more than hardship and danger since boyhood. His spirits were just as buoyant as if he were free. He was as well treated as possible under the circumstances and had no complaints.

We discussed at length what might have been had he kept his promised tryst with General Wallace, and also what might have happened if he had joined Jesse James. He did not doubt the Governor's good intentions any more, but commented on the fact that the plan for the meeting placed him at the mercy of any one on the outside who was being tempted by the big reward. He was bitter against John Chisum, who, he claimed, was behind him until conditions in Lincoln County compelled the intervention of the Government and he was outlawed, after which Chisum faded away and left him to play a lone hand.

While in Santa Fé I was stopping at the Old Exchange Hotel on a corner of the plaza, often called the 'End of the Old Santa Fé Trail,' where, at the intersection of a side street and the plaza, stood a petrified tree-stump about two feet high and nearly the same in diameter. Being easy to see, it was one of the first objects to elicit questions from curiosity-seekers and there was always some old-timer near to unload the following:

'There used to be a big tree thar, stranger, all petrified, petrified branches, petrified leaves, petrified birds' nests, little petrified birds sitting on the petrified limbs with petrified songs stickin out from their mouths, ya'as. But during all these years it has been most all carried away by curious fool strangers.'

I found at the hotel two invitations to receptions that evening. One was from Governor Wallace and his wife at the Palace, the other from Judge Bradford Prince and his wife at their residence. I first paid my respects to the Judge and lady and then to the Palace. At this time Billy the Kid was the principal topic of conversation and everything connected with him was discussed pro and con.

During the evening I strolled into the General's study, where I found him with a small group of friends discussing the Kid. I was made welcome and the occasion, to me, soon developed into a memorable event. The General said that he had heard and read many versions of the battle at McSween's home at Lincoln and soon after Billy the Kid was incarcerated in the Santa Fé jail he decided to get a true account of it from one of the two survivors. So, providing himself with a box of cigars and a bottle of whiskey, he went to the jail and, after announcing to Billy that he did not come as Governor but as man to man, asked him to narrate the exact facts of the McSween affair, and handed the Kid the box and bottle.

Billy promptly thanked him for the cigars, but said he had no use for the bottle; and in his own way he complied with the Governor's request.

This story the Governor now repeated to his guests in his inimitable manner and it proved to be one of the most thrilling I have ever listened to. The Governor himself was carried away with it and evidently full of admiration of the simple and modest manner in which the Kid told the story to him.

I took advantage of the occasion to refer to my meeting with Billy in Las Vegas in 1879 — not mentioning Jesse James — and expressed my regrets that the Governor's plan in behalf of the Kid had miscarried, and hoped it might still be possible.

The General was thoughtful for a moment. Then he shook his head and replied, 'Too late.'

I have both read and heard all manner of stories about what happened, from first to last, between General Wallace and Billy the Kid. Some are correct and others are not. I knew both personally, have discussed each of them with the other, and with the copies of their correspondence before me it is very difficult to understand what basis there ever was for the reports of serious trouble between them, threats from Billy, etc. To be frank, I cannot believe them.

I had the pleasure of meeting General Wallace again, some time after Billy the Kid was removed from Santa Fé, and his opinion of the outlaw was exactly the same as it was when he paced back and forth before the fireplace in the 'Ben-Hur' room in the Palace and dramatically rehearsed his visit to Billy in the jail. Returning to my hotel from the receptions about midnight, I found a small party of men discussing former days, and upon joining them I learned their subject was Kit Carson, famous hunter, scout, and Indian fighter. One of the party was an official of the First National Bank of Santa Fé, who, after a number of Carson stories had been told, asked if we would like to see a real souvenir of the old man. There were no negatives, so he led us to the bank, opened up the vault — there were no time locks then — and brought out the old muzzle-loading, octagon-barreled Hawkins rifle with his powder horn, buckskin bullet-pouch, and wiping-stick, the latter still in the bore of the gun, that altogether helped to make Kit Carson one of the outstanding characters of the old West.

Kit Carson was a member of the Montezuma Masonic Lodge of Santa Fé, which fell heir to this outfit when he died. We all wished it might talk.

CHAPTER XXII

JESSE MARTIN'S GOLD MINE

I WAS hardly seated in the train on my return trip to Bernalillo when I was joined by a former patient, Jesse Martin, a typical old 'desert rat,' who was in a state of partial intoxication. I tried hard to shake him, but he stuck to me like the business end of a cactus, telling me how much he thought of me and at last could repay me for all I had done for him, etc., etc.; and finally he pushed into my hands a big envelope full of papers which proved to be a lot of exceedingly rich assays of gold ore, the story of which he then imparted to me in a maudlin manner.

In some way he had succeeded in interesting General Wallace to the extent of 'grub-staking' him, and not wanting to absorb all the riches that might accrue from the deal he generously (?) took in as a partner a Mr. Lucas, owner of the largest jewelry store on the plaza.

Jesse and his burro had faithfully prospected for some months over a wide range of country, and he had finally landed in a little hamlet, Las Placitas, I think it was called, only a few miles northeast of Bernalillo. He had arrived after dark and, as was customary with his class, slept on the floor of some Mexican adobe home.

There was but one street in the village, upon which the house fronted. As he stepped out next morning his trained professional eye at once detected a peculiar color and formation of the earth in the street. He at once decided it was mineralized and he promptly proceeded to declare and locate a mining claim, with one extension of same, the two covering the town and a good deal of land besides. The notices on these claims contained the names of his two backers and himself.

His activity naturally created intense excitement among the villagers and their first idea was to run him off, but old Jesse was game and, after showing them who was behind him and promising to make them all rich, he practically owned the town. Enjoining secrecy he employed a number of the men at good wages and proceeded to sink a shaft right in the middle of the street, and when it was down about ten feet he sacked up a lot of samples, took the train for Santa Fé, and obtained the assay reports he showed me. One can imagine the sensation he created when he reported all this to Messrs. Wallace and Lucas. He told me they were both wild. They gave him a fat roll of bills with instructions to keep his mouth shut, go back at once, sink the shaft as rapidly as possible, while they would prepare a camp outfit and be down in a few days.

On the way to the train Jesse had made several saloon stops and when he entrained and saw me his gratitude for former favors I had done for him so overcame him that he forgot all about 'keeping his mouth shut'; and that was that.

I thought it all over carefully. Jesse was an old and experienced miner. Everything seemed to ring true. The two claims they had would produce millions. So I decided to take a hand myself. At Lamy Junction I wired my brother at Bernalillo to meet me at the depot with the best team in town prepared to take a trip into the country.

My brother was awaiting me with a very good friend of ours, Colonel Francisco Perea, and his spanking team of black mares hitched to a carriage. Perea was one of the prominent citizens of Bernalillo, formerly a delegate to Congress, and I decided to take him with us.

It was a beautiful moonlight night, the Colonel was a fine driver, and we rolled into the village between midnight and morning. Everything was dark, no one was stirring, so we quietly located an extension on the south end of the property, roused one of the families known to the Colonel, and turned in until morning.

Jesse was sober as a judge and seemed delighted to see us. I did not know whether or not he would remember meeting me on the train, but he did and frankly told me he intended to stake a claim for me the first thing in the morning.

What seemed to be a well-defined vein of mineral matter, of a yellowish red color, and about twenty feet wide, ran almost directly north and south just about the middle of the street of the village. It was very easy to trace either way. We put two men at work sinking a shaft on the vein in our new mine, which we named 'The Christine' in honor of a daughter of the Colonel, and as Mexican homes of the class here are more or less 'buggy' we pitched a camp right on our property.

In a couple of days General Wallace and Mr. Lucas arrived with a camp outfit and were surprised to find my outfit in the game, but were apparently glad to see us and pitched their camp near ours. With their sombreros, blue flannel shirts, overalls in the tops of their boots, and guns at their belts they presented all the earmarks of true Western miners. In assembling their camp equipage, cups and saucers were by some mistake omitted and they substituted empty tin tomato cans for their coffee cups. About two years afterward — possibly longer — I picked up the morning paper at Columbus, Ohio, and read how General Wallace, who had in the mean time been sent as Ambassador to Turkey, had just been entertained at the Sultan's palace in Constantinople at a breakfast where the coffee was served in exquisite china cups rimmed with diamonds. I at once dropped him a few lines asking him if the coffee tasted any better than when he made it himself and drank it from an old tin can in Las Placitas, and enclosed the clipping. In due time I received a reply, written by Mrs. Wallace, to the effect that Turkish coffee did not compare with our 'tin-can brand' even though it was served with diamonds.

From now on the news of this wonderful strike spread like wildfire all over the country. People began to pour in from every direction. A number of newspaper correspondents arrived and kept the wires at the nearest telegraph station hot. Stories were sent out to the effect that all the houses in Las Placitas and the adobe walls around their yards were constructed from this mineral vein and were so rich in gold that people had all moved out and they were being torn down preparatory to being shipped to the smelters. A party came in from New York City, sized up the situation, and before they had been there two hours made the Governor and Mr. Lucas a cash offer of three hundred thousand dollars for their holdings. This was in my presence, so I know it to have been a fact. They both laughed at it and would not consider it for a moment. They then had quite a deep shaft, the contents of which seemed to look better every foot they went down.

Remember that, so far as I know, up to this time all this excitement was absolutely due to that bunch of assays shown me on the train by old Jesse. These were conspicuously posted at the Wallace-Lucas camp and were a magnet that drew all who came to the new strike. Of course ore dumps around the shaft also helped.

The most picturesque object outside the mine, however, was old Jesse Martin himself. Well supplied with a pocketful of gold — I have always wondered just where it came from — he was dressed in the latest fashions, as he saw them, and was surrounded from morning to night by new arrivals to whom he told with thrilling variations the story of the wonderful strike.

The village beauty was a little Mexican señorita, fifteen years of age — and she was a beauty. Jesse began to buy her presents, and after a conference or two with her parents the entire camp was invited to a wedding. Jesse did not spare expense and it was without doubt the most remarkable function Las Placitas had ever experienced before or since. A number of sheep and two beeves were barbecued, several barrels of native wine were on tap, while a good orchestra came from Santa Fé to supply the music for the gran baila that followed the wedding and fiesta.

But all good things must come to an end. I began to feel as if I might have come from Missouri after all, and after a private talk with my brother and Colonel Perea, I secured a few of the most promising looking specimens of ore from Jesse's mine and some from our own, took the train for Santa Fé, and spent twenty-five dollars in an assay office. Result, not a trace of gold.

Although not a word was said, I think about the same time others began to think they were from Missouri too. At any rate, the crowd — including the Wallace-Lucas outfit — began to fade away until old Jesse Martin was the only American left. The real inside facts of this famous fiasco, unprecedented in the history of mining in New Mexico, or elsewhere as far as I know, have been up to this time a complete mystery. Later I met both General Wallace and Mr. Lucas in Santa Fé and they were absolutely unable to explain it. They had investigated carefully. The assays were genuine. They had not given Jesse a cent after the day he brought in the reports and received one hundred dollars. But during the high tide of the bubble Jesse Martin spent many hundreds of dollars. Where did he get them? No one was ever able to find out.

This fact, however, is well known. Jesse Martin stayed right there, continued to work the mine, and always had plenty of money, at least he did, to my certain knowledge, until I left New Mexico about the first of September, 1881. Some years afterward I met some one just from that section and was told that old Jesse was still there.

His exothermic romance was of short life. He soon found his beautiful young bride trifling with a former suitor, and although Jesse was liberal this was over the limit and she and her entire family — whom her husband had supported since the wedding — were sent home. All were sad, but Jesse was adamant.

Page B. Otero offers a solution of the source of Jesse's mysterious income that is the most plausible of any I have heard. A few years ago Mr. Otero met a native of Las Placitas who told him that at certain places in this supposed rich and immense vein there occurred little pockets of almost pure gold. He believed that Jesse knew where to go after them, and would do so when he needed money, but that no one else had ever been able to find them.

CHAPTER XXIII

SILK HATS AND A LAST MEETING WITH BILLY THE KID

ALONZO LIVINGSTONE had been appointed railway agent at Bernalillo and at a recent election we had wagered silk hats on the result. The railway was completed to Albuquerque, and on that date, April 22, 1880, a grand celebration was held in honor of the occasion. Lon and I decided to attend and we donned our new hats for the first time. I suppose there were silk hats in Bernalillo, but I do not remember seeing one until ours arrived.

We arrived early and put up at a new hotel where I was delighted to find my old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Scott Moore, in charge. Everybody enjoyed the parade, and the banquet which was held at our hotel, later. I met a number of former acquaintances, among them being Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Conklin who had moved there from Las Vegas and who later settled at Socorro, as already told.

Lon and I soon discovered that we were quite conspicuous, as not another silk hat was to be seen, but we did not allow that fact to interfere with our pleasure. When we went out in the evening we had to run a gauntlet of wit and wise-cracks, but it was good-natured. By and by we came to a typical Western dance and gambling hall in full blast. It was not long before we attracted the attention of some of the revelers who had been patronizing the bar and were in the midst of a wild carousal.

We were greeted with wild yells of 'Shoot the hats!' and the yells were quickly followed by several shots that went high. Since my arrival in New Mexico I had witnessed several similar incidents, but as a spectator only, never before as a victim. A tenderfoot — and we were evidently taken for such — was invariably hazed by old-timers at these resorts by shooting off his hat, making him dance to the tune of bullets, and usually winding up by compelling him to 'set 'em up' for all hands at the bar. Although the hazing was usually in sport and harmless, any stubborn resistance on the part of the victim meant trouble and not infrequently led to tragedy.

Naturally I felt that I did not belong to the tenderfoot class and glanced at Lon to see how he was standing the gaff. I knew this was his first experience at this game, as he had but recently arrived from the States. His poise was perfect and he appeared cool and self-possessed. I instantly decided to stand my ground.

We jerked our guns just as my hat was shot from my head. But before anything really serious happened, one of the men, yelling, 'Stop, he's my friend!' bounded toward and fairly hugged me. It was William Nickel, 'Slap Jack Bill, the Pride of the Panhandle,' whom I had met as the leader of a band of horse thieves, on the Staked Plains in the Panhandle in 1878, while in Jack Ryan's party picking up stray cattle for the LX Ranch, as previously described.

The Lord alone knows, but I have always believed that but for the shooting off of the stovepipe hat from my red head, which Bill instantly recognized, my career would have ended right there. Maybe that bunch did not make up for their onslaught. We had a bodyguard from that moment. I wore the ventilated lid the rest of the evening with a good deal of pride and kept it many years as a souvenir; but it finally vanished.

A young man of Bernalillo, George Lewis by name, had owed me a bill of seventy-five dollars for service for some time. He boasted of his sprinting ability and declared he never had been beaten. From his talk I naturally concluded that he was a runner. One day I learned he had received a draft for seventy-five dollars and hoped he might call on me, but he did not. Meeting him with some friends I reminded him of his remittance and said that I had often heard of his prowess on the track, winding up with a challenge to run against him one hundred and fifty yards, the stakes to be a receipted bill from me for seventy-five dollars and his draft for a similar amount. He accepted with alacrity.

Although I had then been in Bernalillo for some time, I had never divulged to any one that I had ever had any experience as a sprinter and of course I was not in training. But as I had a feeling that my bill would never be paid in the regular way anyhow, I did not stand to lose very much.

The race was to be run right in the street. The distance was paced off and staked, judges were selected, the purse deposited in Landlord Messick's hands, we toed the mark, the pistol cracked, and away we went. I had always been quick on the start and before we ran ten paces I was perfectly confident I would win.

We ran even for one hundred yards, during which I was never pressed for a moment. With the idea that my opponent also might have some reserve power, I decided to run the rest of the way and as I passed him I yelled, for the benefit of the natives, 'Adios, Jorge' (good-bye, George), and easily beat him at least ten feet. I can't imagine where Lewis got the idea that he could run. I have rarely had an easier man to beat. Any sprinter will realize that when he reads that I did any talking along the way.

I was awaiting the arrival of the southbound train at Bernalillo one afternoon in company with two local merchants, Schuster and Bibb by name, and as the Pullman stopped, I recognized Billy the Kid through one of the windows near the rear of the car. I called the attention of my friends to my discovery and they both laughed at me. They had never seen Bonney. From the blood-thirsty accounts they had read of his career, they had both visualized a very different-looking person from the handsome beardless youth in the window, and both declared I was mistaken.

Knowing the stop was brief, I hustled them into the front end of the car and down the aisle toward Billy, who was facing us. He instantly recognized me and attempted to give the cowboy high sign by throwing up his right hand. But his handcuffs compelled both hands to come up together, and this sight, with the rattle of the chain, so rattled the two doubters that they fled in a panic, amidst the laughter of the passengers.

Opposite the Kid sat Deputy United States Marshal Bob Ollinger and his companion Tony Neis, also a deputy. These men had been selected by Marshal John Sherman, Jr., as the best men on his force to convoy the outlaw from Santa Fé to Mesilla, New Mexico, where he was to be tried for the killing of William Brady when he was sheriff of Lincoln County in 1878. It will be remembered that the race-horse, Dandy Dick, presented to me by the Kid at Tascosa, Texas, was owned and ridden by Sheriff Brady when killed.

After I had identified myself to the escort, I asked Billy if there was anything I could do for his comfort. Ollinger sat with a couple of forty-fives in his belt and a sawed-off double-barreled shotgun between his knees. The Kid was in high spirits and instantly replied: 'Sure, Doc, just grab and hand me Bob's gun for a moment.' Ollinger replied: 'My boy, you had better tell your friend good-bye. Your days are short.'

Said Billy: 'Oh, I don't know, there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip,' the identical quotation he made to Marshal Sherman when we were together in the Santa Fé jail.

At that moment Ollinger little dreamed that within a month he would be killed by the Kid with that very weapon when Billy made his remarkable escape from the jail at Lincoln, April 28, 1881, by killing also J. W. Bell, a deputy sheriff of Lincoln County.

A farewell was spoken, the train rolled out, and I never saw Billy the Kid again. I have just learned incidentally that in January, 1928, a colorful drama of 'Billy the Kid,' written and presented by Viola Vivian, at the Temple of Music and Art in Tucson, Arizona, was produced with success. In preparing this play Miss Vivian collaborated with James H. East, the only man now living of the posse that captured the Kid.

I experienced quite a thrill upon being told that 'Dr. Hoyt' was in the cast. Had I known of it I would have traveled quite a distance to have been in the audience. Not often can one see one's self in just that way. It seems that 'Dr. Hoyt' was played by Mr. Sam R. Falvey. I shall be very much disappointed should I learn he was not 'red-headed,' and I should like to know just what his rôle called for.

CHAPTER XXIV

I GO BACK TO MY STUDIES AND BOX WITH JOHN L. SULLIVAN

THE railroad had been completed to Albuquerque and construction was going on down the valley. The drug business was slowing up, and as I had accumulated money enough to take me through college, I decided to put the drug store in charge of my brother, ship it to Socorro, New Mexico, and to entrain for the East. I had decided to finish at the University of New York and estimated that it would cost me at least three thousand dollars, so with that amount I started, after turning the cash balance over to my brother to finance the new drug store.

There was no bank at Bernalillo, and as one half of my money was in gold I packed it securely in my trunk and with the rest in my pocket I started about September 4, 1881, for Kansas City. At that time there were no through tickets and no through baggage-checking over several different railway lines. Somewhere between Bernalillo and Las Vegas, New Mexico, the train was stopped by a washout and passengers were obliged to walk about a half-mile to a train on the other side — a not very infrequent occurrence during the early days of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad.

We finally arrived at Kansas City at 5 P.M. September 7, 1881, and I at once bought a ticket and secured a berth over the Chicago & Alton Railway for St. Louis, where I had a little business to attend to. Then I went to recheck my trunk, but learned that on account of the washout it had not arrived, and might not come for a day or two.

My first thought was simply to exchange my check and go on, but remembering the gold in the trunk I finally decided to wait in Kansas City and canceled my berth reservation. At breakfast newsboys began yelling 'EXTRAS'! 'ALL ABOUT THE TRAIN ROBBERY!' and with astonishment and other emotions I read the story of the famous Blue Cut train robbery on the Chicago & Alton Railway by the Jesse James gang. This was the last the James gang ever pulled off, and strange to say the date of it was exactly five years from the day they attempted to rob the First National Bank at Northfield, Minnesota, and murdered Cashier Heywood because he refused to open the vault. At the Northfield affair the gang consisted of eight, as previously noted. At the Blue Cut there were six: Jesse and Frank James, Dick Liddil, Charles Ford, Wood and Clarence Hite.

I waited two days, but no trunk came. The agent assured me it would be all right to exchange checks and go on, and next morning I was in St. Louis. My business finished, I consulted a lawyer and learned I could not collect for my fifteen hundred dollars in gold if it was lost. I told my troubles to a doctor friend, who strongly advised me to matriculate at the medical school in Columbus, Ohio, where I would find a splendid faculty, receive more personal attention than at a big school in New York, and last but not least I could complete my college course of lectures and graduate at Columbus for less than one half what a similar tour in New York City would cost.

It began to look as if my trunk was gone for good, so I again exchanged baggage checks and in due course of time matriculated at the Columbus Medical College, now the University of Ohio. I found the faculty to be composed of the very best men in Ohio and the college facilities up to date in every respect.¹

¹ Some time after I was settled in Columbus, Ohio, my trunk finally came along — gold and other contents intact.

I lived at a very nice family hotel on Broad Street, just opposite the Capitol building. To keep in trim physically I took out a membership in the Y.M.C.A. Gymnasium and worked out faithfully from one to two hours daily, paying special attention to boxing and sprinting, my favorite exercises. The Sells Brothers' Circus wintered at their farm near Columbus and several of their performers were regular attendants also. Among them was an acrobatic clown just three feet in height who was a skilled boxer, and whenever the boys wanted a good laugh they would stage a burlesque bout between him and me. He could turn somersaults and while in the air land on me in fine shape, and after a little practice we could put over quite a show. The Athletic Superintendent was a young man from Boston who when a boy had been a schoolmate of that King of the Ring, John L. Sullivan.

Sullivan had climbed the pugilistic ladder until, at this time, he was matched to battle at New Orleans with Paddy Ryan, who then held the championship belt. Sullivan and his staff were giving exhibitions at the principal cities and, while on their way to the battle-ground, stopped off at Columbus. The pugilist was welcomed by his former schoolmate, who in the afternoon brought him to the Gymnasium where he could carry out his daily training. It was a sheer coincidence that they should enter just as the Sells' clown and the Red Doctor — the name I received from the boys at the Gym — were in the midst of one of their performances. When we finished and were introduced to the guest, we learned we had made a hit with him, as well as with ourselves.

During his work-out his manager-trainer, Billy Madden, gave the onlookers a cordial invitation to 'put on the mitts' with the challenger and several of us accepted after stipulating it was to be 'sparring for points' only, no slugging. The Y.M.C.A. Superintendent telephoned me at 6 P.M. that Sullivan had sent word that his sparring partner was suddenly taken ill, and could not appear at the exhibition to be given at the Opera House that night, and urged him to 'get that red-headed doctor' to take his place.

Any man with red blood in his neck has more or less of a combative complex if he understands boxing. Taking everything into consideration, I confess I felt flattered by this invitation and my first impulse was to accept.

I had arrived in Columbus a stranger. I learned that the Reverend Frank Wakely Gunsaulus, a very popular minister, had erected a beautiful new church with a unique feature, the entrance being on each side of the pulpit so that one came in facing the congregation instead of from the rear. Mr. Gunsaulus explained that this naïve change was to permit ladies already seated to size up the new bonnets and styles without stretching and twisting their necks!

He also had a public reception at his home every Thursday evening, where strangers were specially invited, introduced, and treated generally with the utmost friendliness and hospitality. I had availed myself of this invitation, had become a regular attendant at both church and receptions, and through this medium, together with social favors extended by Professor Hamilton and his wife, I had become acquainted with many of the best people of Columbus, Ohio.

It was late in January of 1882 when I was invited to spar with John L. Sullivan at the same Opera House where I was to graduate in March. At that period pugilists were not classed as social lions. I quickly realized that to accept might mean a lot of very undesirable publicity and as I was not looking for that I declined. The Superintendent I think understood, and then invited me to join a box party he was giving for the exhibition.

The house was packed, and we had a fine close-up view of the performance. After our sport at the Gym that afternoon, Sullivan asked me to give his heart a once-over, which gave me an opportunity to look him over generally. He was in the pink of condition and the most perfect specimen of physical manhood I have ever seen, before or since. Since that time I have met James J. Corbett, Patsy Cardiff, Bob Fitzsimmons, and Jack Dempsey — the last-named having in my opinion the most symmetrical physique of them all.

Sullivan was very dark-complexioned, with heavy hair, eye-brows, and mustache, all black. With his massive form and supple movements he presented a formidable front to his antagonist that night of the exhibition. From his entourage he had selected Pete McCoy as his opponent to replace his regular sparring mate. McCoy was either a middle or light heavyweight, I have forgotten which, and was considered one of the best boxers of his time in America.

In our set-to at the Gym, John L. was paying particular attention to his defense, and I was invited to hit him as often and as hard as I could, which I soon learned was not difficult to do.

They squared off on the stage, and it was not long before Pete McCoy landed on John L.'s face with a whack that resounded all over the house and was greeted with a roar of applause. In a very short time this was repeated with a harder blow than before. Sullivan's heavy eye-brows began to droop with a scowl, his eyes glittered, he crouched, and began to glide around with the speed and grace of a panther, his face plainly registering rage. An opening appeared and like a flash he landed a terrific blow on McCoy's jaw, knocking him into complete insensibility almost over the footlights. Exactly that would have happened to me had I accepted that invitation!

John L. Sullivan went on to New Orleans and, as all the world knows, became the heavyweight champion by defeating Paddy Ryan in nine rounds without gloves, under the London Prize Ring Rules. Paddy confessed later that when struck by John L. it felt as if some one had hit him with a telegraph pole endways.

I saw Sullivan at St. Paul, Minnesota, in the late eighties or early nineties. He was on a tour offering a purse of one thousand dollars to any man who would stand up before him for three rounds of three minutes each, under the Marquis of Queensberry rules.

An employee of the Northern Pacific Railway, Hafey by name, six feet six inches in height and some two hundred and twenty-five pounds in weight, was the acknowledged amateur champion among the railroad men in that section, and he decided to go after this purse.

I met him at the Merchants' Hotel during the afternoon and he was very confident. 'Doc,' said he, 'I don't expect to hurt John L., and I shan't try to — but say, there ain't a man on earth with a pillow on each hand that can knock me out. That I know!'

At this time Dr. Ames was Mayor of Minneapolis, Robert A. Smith Mayor of St. Paul, and I had become Commissioner of Health of the latter city. Both mayors were friends of mine, and fond of sports, so I gave a party including them, our Chief of Police, Jack Clark, and a few others, and before the performance took them behind the scenes to the star's room and introduced them. John L. was then at the height of his popularity, and happened to be in an amiable mood, so we had a very pleasant call. Learning that we wished to get as close a view as possible, Sullivan had us conducted to the stage, where chairs were provided between the wings, giving us a fine opportunity to see without being seen by the spectators.

The champion stepped onto the stage from our side and Hafey from the other; they shook hands and the fun began. As they squared off, Sullivan actually looked small in comparison with Hafey.

In less than ten seconds an opening presented itself and Hafey was fairly lifted from his feet with a blow under the chin, and but for his staggering against a wing he would have been knocked flat. He was game, however, and came back with a rush, when Sullivan, springing straight up in the air, shot his terrific right to Hafey's neck, crumpling him to the floor, where he took the count. The champion stalked to the front of the stage and delivered in a gruff voice one of his characteristic orations. Raising his hand to quell the applause, he said, 'This guy has been bragging around town that he'd win the purse. He lasted just thirty seconds.'

Hafey was dragged from the stage and a bucket of water dashed over his head before he knew where he was. 'Doc,' he said, 'after that first lick I never saw nothin' but stars.'

CHAPTER XXV

GETTING ON IN MY PROFESSION

AFTER graduating in March, 1882, in the same Opera House where John L. Sullivan lost his temper and knocked out Pete McCoy, I could not resist comparing the two occasions. As I stood on that stage and received my hard-earned diploma, I wondered what would have happened had I taken Pete's job.

Returning to my old house at St. Paul, Minnesota, in April, 1882, I soon became active in my profession.

During my tenure of office for nine years at the head of the Department of Health of St. Paul, Minnesota, I left a record of handling ten outbreaks of smallpox without the spread of a single case, after the discovery of the outbreak. While in that position I was responsible for the vaccination of over forty thousand persons without a death. There was no mystery or secret connected with my method of handling and checking an outbreak of smallpox. I had compiled a health law from legislation in force in the principal cities of our country and Europe, added sections adapted to local conditions, and had it passed by the State Legislature. That gave me the necessary authority to act at once in an epidemic emergency, instead of having to call meetings, discuss, argue, and almost fight a lot of politicians before I could get authority to go to the expense of purchasing as much as a postage stamp.

I had a right to be proud of this Public Health Act as well as the manner in which it became a law. I had been at the head of the Department of Health for two years, had made a good record, and expected to be reëlected.

Just before the term expired I discharged an inspector for flagrant dishonesty. He was a typical 'ward-heeler,' and the City Council, considering politics only, served me with a private notice to reinstate him or lose my job. I was advised by a prominent political friend to promise this concession, and after my reflection to forget it. This idea was quite different from certain principles taught me by my parents, so I promptly turned it down, and was just as promptly kicked out of office. It was understood that my successor had promised, but if he did he forgot it, and the 'ward-heeler' was loser after all.

I then compiled and drew up my Health Act, keeping it a secret from all but a lifelong friend, Eugene A. Hendrickson, then a member of the Minnesota Legislature. At the psychological moment Hendrickson introduced my bill and — by suspension of rules — passed it through the House before noon. Before 5 P.M. our Senators, Robert A. Smith and Albert Schaeffer, put it through the Senate, it was rapidly engrossed, and before midnight was signed by Governor William R. Merriam and became a law.

This act reinstated me, and the howl that went up from that political Council was long and mournful. Their power and patronage were gone, in so far as all matters pertaining to the public health were concerned. I held the position of Commissioner of Health for the next seven years.

The moment a case of smallpox was discovered in St. Paul, I at once established an absolute quarantine — in one instance a shotgun quarantine — of the case or cases, including every man, woman, and child that had been exposed up to that time, and at once vaccinated the latter contingent. Smallpox cases were quarantined at a hospital for that purpose just outside the city limits, and those exposed were quarantined wherever they happened to be when discovered. The latter were held for two weeks and then turned loose after complete disinfection of clothing, bodies, followed by the fumigation of furniture and buildings.

Two of the outbreaks occurred in hotels, the first in the Merchants' Hotel, one of the most prominent in St. Paul at that time, owned by a member of the City Council and Chamber of Commerce. Two cases were found there, a colored and a white man, both employees. The white man was in charge of the billiard room for years. The darky had never been vaccinated, and his case was the confluent form, while the other, having been vaccinated successfully about ten years before, had only a mild case of varioloid. Both were at once removed to the hospital and the hotel, with all persons that had been exposed, was promptly quarantined. This did not suit the owner, who made a very strong speech at the Chamber of Commerce denying that there was any smallpox, declared that the Commissioner of Health did not know smallpox from the freckles on a turkey egg, etc., and announced that a suit against the city for a large sum for each day his hotel was shut up would be started at once.

I lost no time in getting a photograph of each of the two cases in the hospital and posted them in one of the windows of the Chamber of Commerce Building fronting on one of the principal streets of the city. In a short time I was visited by Chief of Police Jack Clark, who said that there was an actual blockade of the street in front of the photographs by a curious crowd, and as fast as one group was moved on another took its place. So I decided that my object was accomplished and had them removed. No more was heard from the proprietor of the hotel and the quarantine was kept on during the usual time.

At that period everybody was not running around with a kodak, and those photographs were considered to be the best photographs of genuine smallpox in the United States. They became almost invaluable to me in the matter of vaccination. As is well known, there is a strong movement in certain circles against vaccination. In St. Paul vaccination was compulsory; and each year before the opening of schools a large number of parents would come to the Health Department with all kinds of excuses in an effort to get their children admitted without vaccination. I would then ask them if they had ever seen a case of smallpox. Invariably the answer would be 'no.' I would then hand out my two pictures with the statement, 'The man in this picture had been vaccinated, but the one in the other had not.' In ninety-nine cases in a hundred one good look was sufficient and they were glad to allow their children to be protected as provided for by law.

A few last words regarding vaccination. It takes all kinds of people to make a world, but it is absolutely incomprehensible to me how any human being, with any brains, intelligence, or education, can for a moment oppose it. The one fact disclosed by history is that before its discovery and introduction in the civilized world smallpox caused the death of more people than all other diseases put together, and that since the introduction of vaccination the mortality is less than of any other contagious disease. This ought to settle the question at once and for all time.

After becoming chief surgeon of railways employing thousands of men, I learned that there was a great need of a complete physical examination of a man before putting him in charge of property of much value or the lives of thousands of human beings. All that was necessary then to get on the payroll of a railway company was to pass a rather simple examination for color-blindness, and to have the ears tested.

A few of the older lines had what they called a physical examination, but it was far from thorough. After considerable experience and observation I prepared, in May, 1897, and read before the tenth annual meeting of the International Association of Railway Surgeons at Chicago, a paper entitled, 'Observations upon and Reasons for a More Complete Physical Examination of Railway Employees.' It aroused a good deal of interest, was strongly endorsed by a long editorial in 'The Railway Age,' and eventually many railway companies adopted the method suggested.

A political position is anything but a bed of roses, as I learned many, many times during my official term of nine years. The 'in' party of course controlled the appointment and during my entire tenure of office there was scarcely a month passed in which the 'outs' did not make an effort to wipe me off the political map. A voyage in a political ship is a stormy one, from start to finish. I had to meet not only political tricks of every description, but personal attacks of all sorts, even attempted blackmail.

When I first took charge of public health affairs there was no inspection of foods. It was not long before I had a tip that led to an investigation of our meat supply. I had one of my best inspectors — am sorry I cannot remember his name — disguise himself as a laborer and go from one to another of the slaughter houses adjacent and get work, staying long enough at each to make a complete report to me of their methods employed.

It was not long before he caught a big burly German selling meat from 'lumpy-jaw' cattle. Judge W. T. Burr, of the Municipal Court, fined the culprit the limit, one hundred dollars, and sent him to the workhouse for ninety days, at the same time saying he only regretted he could not give a more severe sentence.

When this affair was made public, there was a wave of indignation over the city. The result was the establishment of a careful inspection of all meat sold in St. Paul.

Another sequel of this adventure was that there was scarcely a piece of beef consumed as food in St. Paul for a month. Not long afterward a milk inspection also was established.

During the first eight years of my incumbency there were numerous cases of diphtheria every winter, but few during the summer. In 1894, not long after the discovery of the antitoxin, Dr. Kinyoun, of the Marine Hospital staff at Washington, D.C., was sent by Surgeon-General Wyman to Paris and Berlin to investigate and report its efficacy. He returned a very enthusiastic convert.

I at once went to Washington and spent several days with him in his laboratory there. I knew him well, as we were both members of the American Public Health Association, and I was shown the entire technic of the propagation and exhibition of this great boon to humanity. Returning home I reported my findings to the City Council and urged the establishing of a bacteriological laboratory, which was later provided.

In the early days of my service sanitary science was virtually in its swaddling clothes. Its progress and advancement during the past fifty years have been marvelous. Wherever its provisions and methods are utilized, one will find smallpox, diphtheria, typhoid fever, yellow fever, cholera, bubonic plague, scarlet fever, and other infectious and contagious diseases almost extinct.

The human viewpoint is a strange thing. People accept the experience and advice of their shoemaker, plumber, etc., implicitly, with rare exceptions, while in matters concerning the most important asset they have in this world — their health — they will accept suggestions and advice — often a matter of life and death — from any Tom, Dick, or Harry they may happen to meet; totally forgetting or ignoring the expert, educated physician who spends the greater part of his life in accumulating knowledge for the benefit of the human race.

CHAPTER XXVI

CHIEF SURGEON OF VOLUNTEERS IN THE WAR WITH SPAIN

IN the spring of 1898 we were at war with Spain. The world was electrified with the victory of the American fleet at Manila.

My family has been represented in every war of our country beginning with the Revolution. With the promise of being sent to the Philippines, I accepted a commission as Major and Chief Surgeon of Volunteers and was much disappointed at being ordered for duty at Chickamauga Park, Georgia. I served on the staff of General Frederick D. Grant, commanding the First Division, Third Army Corps, during June, July, and August. I was then assigned as Chief Surgeon of the Third Army Corps, commanded by General Frank, which had been transferred to Anniston, Alabama, as the general sanitary conditions were better there.

At that post we were visited by the General Granville B. Dodge Commission, 'inspecting the conduct of the War' by order of President McKinley. They made a favorable report of conditions there. When I first assumed charge of the First Division Hospital at Chickamauga, it was in bad shape. After sizing up the medical officers of the division, I selected Charles M. Drake, Brigade Surgeon with the rank of Major, who proved to be a good one. He was from Georgia and I picked him for two reasons: he had red hair and he had been chief surgeon of a Southern railway.

Much fault was found with the Medical Department at Chickamauga during the summer of 1898, and General

H. V. Boynton was sent by the Secretary of War to inspect it and report. This report he submitted August 31 and about every hospital in the camp was criticized adversely except Major Drake's, which was commended.

When ordered to Anniston, Alabama, I took pains to see that Drake came also. I had gone down in advance of the troops and selected a site for the General Hospital, Third Army Corps, on a beautiful elevation near the city. The water supply at Anniston was an immense spring, which was tapped and piped to the camp of each unit including the hospital. The hospital was laid out in the form of a Maltese cross, surrounded with a wide walk of white sand edged with cobblestones, and in front of the main entrance a fountain played constantly. There were board floors everywhere and drainage was perfect. The ingenuity and resourcefulness of Major Drake was apparent at every turn. I was in the service nearly five years, and saw many field hospitals, but in comfort for the patients, picturesque surroundings, and completeness of equipment, this was the outstanding one of them all.

Secretary Alger came early one morning in a special train, sent for me, and asked to be shown the hospitals of the Corps. There was a switch and side track that enabled his train to pull up very close to the General Hospital. This the Secretary and staff, including Surgeon-General Sternberg, inspected very thoroughly. I instructed Major Drake to keep his staff busy and away from the visitors that the patients might be free to enter complaints if any cared to. Mr. Alger noted this and commended us for it later. No complaints were made that we ever heard of.

On the way to the train I was informed by the Secretary that from what he had seen at the General Hospital he did not consider it necessary to inspect the different regimental hospitals and we returned to the headquarters in the city. He was evidently pleased with what he had seen, and while we were on our way to the city I made bold to tell him of my disappointment in being sent South and requested that I be ordered to the Philippines should any more troops be sent there. He looked at me a moment and answered: 'Major, I will remember you.'

GENERAL FREDERICK D. GRANT AND STAFF AT CHICKAMAUGA
PARK, JUNE, 1898

At that time he was doubtless the most harassed and worried man in the country. He was being blamed by many of the leading newspapers for bad canned beef, for typhoid fever among the troops, as well as for about every other mishap since the war began.

Arriving at headquarters he instructed the commander, General Royal T. Frank, to order a review of the Corps and after it to assemble all the officers at headquarters that he might meet and say good-bye to them. This was done and after a very interesting talk, he shook hands with and said good-bye to each officer as he passed out. When my turn came, he grasped my hand, slapped me on the back with his left, and smiling, again said, 'Major, I will remember you.'

I now decided that he was a diplomat and a good politician, but gave up all hope of ever getting to the Philippines. October 24, 1898, I received one of the surprises of my entire military career. A special order from Secretary Alger sending me to the Philippines arrived with the following clause: 'Upon completion of his attendance before the Commission to investigate the conduct of the war.'

It appears that this was an unusual order. It at once attracted the attention of the newspaper men at Washington who arrived at different conclusions concerning it.

Next morning the 'Cincinnati Enquirer' head-lined me on the front page with:

'WARNING TO ARMY OFFICERS. Major Henry F. Hoyt banished to the Philippine Islands for his very radical testimony against the administration when before the Commission, etc., etc.' Wise Washington correspondent!

I sailed from San Francisco in November, 1898, on the Pacific Mail Liner, Rio Janeiro, commanded by Captain Ward. Some years afterward this steamer entered Golden Gate in a fog, struck a reef near the shore, and went down, drowning almost all the passengers and officers, including Captain Ward. There was a large shipment of gold from the Orient aboard, but, although searched for by divers from all over, no trace of the missing ship has ever been found.

From the fact that I had friends in Shanghai my two-day lay-over there was exceedingly pleasant. When the famous Chinaman, Li Hung Chang, toured the world, he met and signed up a ten-year contract as Imperial Director of Railways in China with Captain W. W. Rich, then Chief Engineer of the Soo Railway lines, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, who had been a friend of mine for some years. A former classmate at the University of Minnesota, John Goodnow, was then the United States Consul-General at Shanghai, and as his charming and accomplished wife had been a patient of mine when a young girl, I was quite sure of a hearty welcome.

I found my friend Captain Rich in a fine building, its furnishings and equipment palatial. His staff were high-caste Chinese who spoke better English than the average American. The state reception- and dining-rooms of Consul-General Goodnow's palace were the most elaborate, richly furnished, and altogether ornate apartments I had ever visited.

After two delightful days farewells were spoken and our good ship steamed away for Hongkong, where I took the United States Transport Zafiro, commanded by Captain Whitton. I arrived at Manila December 13, 1898.

CHAPTER XXVII

TO THE PHILIPPINES AND SERVICE UNDER FIRE

UPON reporting at headquarters I was assigned as Chief Surgeon, Second Division, Eighth Army Corps, commanded by Major-General Arthur MacArthur, one of the finest men I ever knew, and served with him for nine months. That period included the Malolos and San Fernando campaigns of 1899, in which I personally participated in over twenty battles and engagements against Emilio Aguinaldo, and his insurgent army.

General MacArthur's headquarters was the Palace, formerly the home of Admiral Montojo, commander of the Spanish fleet destroyed by Admiral Dewey. It was a beautiful building fronting on Calle Gran Solano, its rear flush with the Pasig River, where, by descending a few stone steps, the Admiral could step into his launch and be carried to the fleet. The building was illuminated by over a thousand electric lights. The front lawn was guarded by a five-foot stone wall surmounted by an open iron fence of exquisite design, behind which grew a great profusion of the most beautiful tropical flowers and foliage. The building was elaborately furnished in solid mahogany, with silk or satin upholstering, and the floors were polished until they could almost be used as mirrors.

The lower story we used as offices and our commissary; the upper as sleeping apartments. The Filipino bed is unique, much larger than ours, usually of solid mahogany, the posts supporting a canopy in addition to the inevitable mosquito bar, and instead of our springs and mattresses there is a cane bottom, over which is spread a very thin bamboo mat. Two sheets and three pillows complete the affair. One of the pillows, round and larger than the others, is used, when sleeping on one side, between the knees for ventilation. It is known as the 'Dutch wife.'

In the Philippines metallic articles, if not kept oiled, will quickly rust. One of the duties of my 'boy' was to look after my emergency instrument case, always ready in my room, weapons, etc., and for this I had furnished him with a pound can of vaseline. Evidently he was watched by a colony of monkeys on the premises, for on returning from a few days' absence I found an empty can and absolutely everything get-at-able in the room smeared with vaseline by the little rascals.

During December, 1898, amicable relations between the Malay and the American had ceased. Our trenches, occupied by our troops, ran from sea to sea like a horse-shoe, just outside the city, while about a mile away Aguinaldo's army and trenches paralleled ours. Manila was under martial law and a ten o'clock curfew obtained. Returning home one night about eleven o'clock in a victoria alongside the big moat surrounding the old walled city, we heard an unearthly din caused by the croaking of millions of frogs that infested the moat. A boiler factory would be music compared to them. There was a fog. Approaching a street intersection it seems we were halted in the regular way by a sentry who was neither seen nor heard by my cochero, and the next instant there was a flash in the fog in front and a Springfield bullet grazing his right side missed me in the rear seat by an inch and passed on through the back of the carriage top, mute evidence of our narrow escape. The cochero's seat was in the middle and a little above the back seat, on the right of which I sat.

At the crack of the rifle — that could just be heard

GENERAL ROYAL T. FRANK AND STAFF AT ANNISTON, ALABAMA, SEPTEMBER-OCTOBER, 1898

above the frolic of the frogs — the horses were pulled up quickly, and I hailed the sentry, who then approached and was worse frightened than the cochero when he sized up the situation. A sentry had recently been bolo-ed and very strict orders had been issued that he no doubt complied with. I acted as attorney, judge, and jury and convicted and sentenced the frogs — and we went on our way rejoicing. My cochero was different from the average native. He was taller, very dignified, wore a 'Valentino' set of side-burns, was in fact rather a distinguished-looking chap. He was very faithful and took splendid care of my team and victoria.

A few days before the insurrection he came to tell me that his father was very ill in Malolos, and while mucho sorry, he would have to go at once. He brought a substitute with him and went his way.

April 25, 1899, the battle at Bagbag River was fought. General Hale's brigade crossed the river, and flanking a trench on its north side left it literally full of dead insurgents. I stood watching our soldiers pulling the bodies out to have the wounded cared for should any be found, when one of our boys called out, 'Look, here's a Comandante' (Major).

I stepped up and there lay my poor cochero shot through the brain. I had him buried and the grave marked, but never knew whether his people found it or not.

From December feeling between the Americans and Aguinaldo's men became more tense each day. Although the latter were permitted to enter Manila at will, Americans were taboo inside of the insurgent lines.

About 10 P.M., February 4, 1899, Private William Grayson of Company 'D,' First Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, on sentry duty at San Juan Bridge, shot and killed an insurgent lieutenant who paid no attention to repeated orders to 'Halt!' and the war was on.

In a few moments a roar from thousands of rifles resounded through and around the city, the sound accentuated by the smashing of bullets against the corrugated iron roofs and buildings in all parts of Manila.

General MacArthur established temporary headquarters in front of the famous Bilibid Prison and I parked the ambulances near by. It was a battle in the trenches on both sides all night long and until about noon February 5, when a general advance of our army was ordered. The boys had been awaiting this a long time.

In due time General MacArthur and staff rode the lines beginning at the extreme left. It was my first experience under fire in battle. We paused for a time as we reached a section of the Utah Volunteer Light Artillery in action on an eminence to the left of La Loma Cathedral (Chinese Catholic) just north of Manila. The Utah Artillery was commanded by Major Richard W. Young (grandson of Brigham Young), Chief of Artillery on the staff of General MacArthur. He was a West-Pointer and made a splendid record in the Islands.

While we were watching the effects of Young's shell, Sergeant Bernard Sharpe of the Third Artillery — an organization supporting the Utahs as infantry — was seen to fall a short distance away. As no surgeon was near, I rode over and found he had sustained a severe gunshot wound through one of his knees; so I gave him first aid and sent him back, the first soldier I had treated in battle. Later he was commissioned and is now retired as Major. To illustrate the wonderful progress in my profession I will say that if Sharpe's wound through a knee joint had occurred in the Civil War, his leg would have been amputated at once. In 1899, however, it was saved by aseptic surgery. He returned to duty within two months and later was wounded again, but is still enjoying life thirty years after.

As I rode into the corral at headquarters that night at nine o'clock, my faithful little mount, of Arabian descent, fell dead. We were galloping down a steep decline after leaving La Loma, I near the center of the cavalcade, when my horse tripped over a stone and fell headlong. As I also went down head first, I should doubtless have been severely injured but for the fact that by special permission I was wearing a white cork East Indian helmet, being fearful of sunstroke in the tropics under a campaign hat. I was the only man in the army wearing a white helmet in this campaign.

The battle of Caloocan, February 10, 1899, was fought by our First Brigade, commanded by General Harrison Gray Otis, and as the center of the battle-line was too broken for horses I accompanied General Otis on foot. It was over a mile to Caloocan, and when about halfway Lieutenant Colonel Bruce Wallace not far away, leading the first Montana Volunteer Infantry, was shot by a Mauser, the bullet entering just to the right of his heart, coming out close to the spine. He tried to tell me something which I quickly stopped, as the blood was gushing from his mouth at each gasp, and as he was carried away on a litter I never expected to see him alive again. He lived, however, and returned to duty much sooner than he should. He was young, ambitious, and as this seemed his chance he could not resist the urge. As a result he did not last very long in the service, was sent home, and soon passed away.

After the battle Caloocan became General MacArthur's headquarters. In my department the regulations called for two men of the Hospital Corps to be assigned to each litter. My experience in the first two battles demonstrated that even six white men could carry a man but a short distance in that hot, humid, tropical climate. I anticipated trouble, as poor or no roads in that rough country, with other reasons, often made it imperative that the dead or wounded be carried on litters for long distances. In Hongkong I had often seen two Chinese coolies with a rope and bamboo pole pick up a piano, or other article as heavy, and trot along with it all over town if necessary with little apparent exertion or fatigue.

I decided to experiment, and made an official recommendation that Chinese coolies be substituted as litter-bearers, giving reasons. My recommendation was at once approved and one hundred and fifty were sent to me by the Chief Quartermaster for that purpose. Except twelve held in reserve, they were distributed pro rata among the different units. I detailed Major F. J. Adams of the First Montana Regiment to drill and train them, to be assigned to a litter in charge of a Hospital Corps private.

One night a call came from the trenches for three litters, and six of our coolies had their first try-out. It was dark, the trenches some distance off, they were exposed to desultory firing all the way, and only one was in at the finish, in spite of the fact that the Americans did their best to pull them along.

Next morning Major Adams got a little leather rosette that decorated some saddle or bridle, lined up the column of Chinese, had the sole remnant of the rout step to the front, and after a spread-eagle eulogy on his bravery, passed on by the interpreter, pinned the badge of honor to his blouse, gave him a hearty handshake — in fact handed him everything that usually goes with a function of this kind, except kissing him on both cheeks — and it is an historical fact that never again did a coolie litter-bearer flunk under fire.

We were at Caloocan for some time, awaiting reënforcements, and had many visitors. The British cruiser Powerful was at anchor in the bay, and one day General

GENERAL ARTHUR MACARTHUR AND STAFF AT MALOLOS

Left to right: Capt. Edgar Russel, Maj. Putnam Bradlee Strong, Capt. James Lockett, Maj. John S. Mallory, Gen. MacArthur, Maj. Hoyt, Maj. J. Franklin Bell, Professor Becker (U.S. Geological Survey)

MacArthur was visited by Captain the Honorable Hedworth Lambton, Commander Ethelston, and a party of junior officers from that vessel. Lambton and Etherton were middle-aged men who had seen real service, while the others were youngsters who as yet had never smelled gunpowder. They wanted to look at the trenches, and as everything was quiet General MacArthur was willing and we started. A broad street led from the church door straight to the trenches. There were at least twenty in the party, and as we neared the trench a hot fusillade came from the insurgent lines just across from the Tulliajan River at a range of about a mile, provoked of course by the sight of our party. The music of the Mauser bullets as they 'pinged' over and about us no doubt produced acute attacks of tachycardia in many of us, especially the young Englishmen, as demonstrated by sudden involuntary twitching of their heads. This being observed by one of their veteran commanders, they were further stimulated by an angry scowl and a sharp command from him, 'Gentlemen, gentlemen, no ducking, no ducking,' and the way those sickly spines stiffened up from then on was amusing.

That there were no casualties was due to the poor marksmanship of the Filipino. If they made a hit it was by accident. They were brave and very expert with the weapons they were familiar with, but as the Spaniards never allowed a native to possess firearms the rifle game was new. Before the advent of the American in the Islands most of the fighting between the Spaniard and native was what might be termed a trench duel. Fighting in the open, or a charge, was unknown.

A Spanish officer, a prisoner in the insurgent army, escaped and entered our lines. He was a bright chap and entertained us by comparing the fighting methods as he saw them: 'The Filipino, entirely concealed in the trench, simply elevates his gun over the top and pulls the trigger. The Spaniard peeps over the trench top, takes aim, shoots, and instantly ducks out of sight. The American looks over, takes aim, and, as his gun cracks, springs to his feet and looks to see if he has made a hit.' The Spaniard's physical demonstration of this was a scream. He was a good actor.

CHAPTER XXVIII

I GET A WOUND IN ACTION

WHILE the troops were at the front the Division headquarters in Manila were in charge of a sergeant with twenty-five men, and usually one of the staff would spend the night there. The Thirteenth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry was serving in Manila as the provost guard. The committee on rumors had reported a number of conspiracies and all kinds of plots and uprisings, the usual objective being a massacre of all Americans, but so far all were either dreams or a flash in the pan. But finally the cry of 'wolf' was a real one.

February 22, 1899, it was my turn to come to town and on this occasion I was joined by Captain Charles McClure, Acting Judge Advocate of our staff. We came in about 11 P.M. from a downtown show and were about to retire when, with the suddenness of a thunderbolt from above, the ball opened. In an instant the roar of rifles in action spread over the city, the din being almost as great as in the first battle, that of February 4.

Admiral Montojo had constructed an observation tower on the roof. We quickly repaired to this and were thunderstruck by the scenes all about us. It seemed as if most of the city was on fire. Flames were shooting skyward in every direction and with the shooting and shouting, created a condition that would terrify almost any one. We did not have to be told that the long-propheesied uprising was on. Several bullets had already entered the building, and after a short conference we divided the guard, McClure taking the Pasig River side while I stationed my men behind the stone wall fronting the street. The headquarters was so well known we felt confident it would be attacked, either by cascos (native boats) on the river, or on the street side, possibly on both sides at once.

The headquarters guard were picked men and as both McClure and I were good shots, we felt we could put up a fight. After arriving in the Islands and learning the character of the native, I recommended another departure in the Medical Department, 'that the personnel be armed,' which was approved. I was carrying a Mauser pistol, a ten-shot automatic, the most deadly weapon of its size and weight I have ever run across.

Opposite our headquarters was the palatial home of Don Eduardo Eugester y de la Deheza, a remarkable character. His father was Swiss and his mother a Spanish mestiza. He could speak and write fluently five different languages, was an artist, musician, and a successful business man. With his remarkable baritone voice he had toured Europe several times with Adelina Patti during his earlier career.

He was a strong pro-American and we had become close friends. He had a beautiful lawn adorned with typical tropical shrubbery, and glancing in that direction I could see a shadowy form of a man skulking through it. I called to him both in English and Spanish to 'throw up his hands,' but he paid no heed, and turning to my detachment I prepared to give the order to fire, but for some unaccountable reason my voice simply refused to work.

During the few seconds that I was dumb, the skulker vanished, and I had one of my men make a détour to investigate and warn Don Eduardo. Returning he reported it was the Don himself whom we had seen. He had heard a suspicious noise and was investigating on his own account. He almost collapsed when told of his narrow escape.

The Minnesota regiment did splendid work that eventful night. Several times bodies of insurgents working toward our building were beaten back by them and by daybreak the enemy had disappeared. They made no attempt to attack by way of the Pasig. Reënforcements having arrived, the army began the northern advance at daybreak, March 25. The battle-line was several miles long, the General and staff near the center. Fighting began from the start and continued all day.

At noon we rested under a gigantic mango, and coffee was being prepared in a near-by ravine sheltered from bullets. An officer from the Japanese army had joined us to observe our military methods in war. Italy was also represented. I started to see if the coffee was coming along all right, and passing a large tree found our Japanese friend squatting on its safe side, his watch in his left hand, the fingers of his right on his pulse. Thinking he was ill, I questioned him.

'No,' he replied, 'I am not sick. Before ze bullets my pulse he seventy-two, after ze bullets he one hundred and twenty. I no like ze bullets.'

He actually made an official report of this to his Government. Japanese efficiency!

The next day about noon we were at a bamboo hut in a rice field where a big olla full of cool fresh water was found from which everybody was quenching the thirst that Kipling tells us about — only I think he sidesteps water. We were all oblivious of the fact that bullets from a long trench a half-mile away were coming along thick and fast. By this time it was a case of familiarity breeding contempt. An orderly was passing out the water in a tin cup and just as the Japanese grasped the handle a big Remington (the insurgents were armed with Mausers and Remingtons) bullet smashed through its center. He evidently knew when he had enough, as he disappeared next morning sans any farewell and we saw him no more.

A few minutes after the crushing of the cup, Private Donavan from Minnesota, chief clerk for General MacArthur, had his horse shot dead from under him, and almost before he was on his feet a spent Remington bullet buried itself in his left elbow joint. I at once cut out the bullet and Donavan retained it as a souvenir. This was another wound that in the Civil War would have cost an arm and possibly a life. Donavan made a very rapid recovery and returned to duty.

Even General MacArthur, with all his sang-froid under fire, looked homesick, so we moved. When I wrote up my diary that night I find as a finis: 'And I am still alive.'

March 29, 1899, was for me a red-letter day. We advanced early and fighting soon became hot all along the line. The rough country and impenetrable jungle compelled a long détour of our horses by the right flank of the army while the General and staff advanced on foot along the railroad. About 9 A.M., from a thick bamboo hedge, several bands of men could be seen coming, and with the idea they might be bringing in some wounded, we all stopped to train our field glasses on them.

There had been a lull in the fighting for a short time as the insurgents were retreating, but the moment we stopped a brisk sniping began right in front of us at a range of four hundred yards — from a concealed trench, we learned later — and I had the bad luck to be the one man hit in our party. A Remington bullet tore off the iron brace supporting the outside of a heavy leather legging on my left leg, causing a slight flesh wound, and at the same time a spent Mauser bullet buried itself in the muscles of my left thigh just above the knee.

My first impression was that some one had given me a violent kick, but as I staggered back, I glanced down, and the little hole through my riding trousers together with the dilapidated legging told the story. Assisted by my hospital steward and orderly, I quickly cut out the bullet and gave both my wounds first aid, and as we were within a day or two of our objective, Malolos, I decided to go on, although General MacArthur urged me to go into Manila and not take any chances. I confided in him that I would rather lose a leg than miss the capture of Malolos, and he said no more.

We entered Bigaa about noon, halted, and I was soon resting on a big Filipino bed upstairs at the railway station, my mind full of the problem of how to transport our casualties from our advancing front. The retreating army destroyed all bridges over the numerous streams except those iron railway bridges over which ambulances and bull-carts could not pass. This resulted in all our transportation facilities being far in the rear.

Before the outbreak Aguinaldo outgeneraled us by getting behind his lines all the engines and most of the rolling stock on the railway in the Islands which ran north from Manila. An old broken-down engine and a few damaged box- and flat-cars were found, repaired by our men, and were now used as fast as the railway track, which the insurgents also destroyed as much as they could, was repaired. But our advance was rapid and our crippled Manila Limited was always some distance behind.

The bugle call of 'Forward' broke my rest, and as I limped downstairs I saw in the yard the remnants of a hand-car. Calling my men, I quickly improvised, with these remnants and the big body of the bed from upstairs, the first Philippine palace-car ever turned out in Luzon. With a silken canopy for shade, a bunch of Igorote prisoners as motive power, my train de luxe would comfortably carry six to eight wounded men south to the dressing-station, rapidly change from palace to freight-car, and return with a much-needed cargo of rations and other supplies.

Although I was never given credit for this device in pictures, I have seen mention of it in historical publications. The following quotation from the official report of General MacArthur placing its origin may be interesting: 'The excellent service of the Medical Department, as previously reported, has been continued throughout the campaign. The Chief Surgeon, Major Henry F. Hoyt, displayed skill and ingenuity in providing for the wounded under the exceptional conditions which arose in consequence of the ambulances being unable to cross streams over which all the bridges had been destroyed, and the substitution therefor of hand-cars improvised into practical vehicles for the conveyance of the wounded.'

The insurgents were so badly whipped at Bigaa that not a shot had been fired before we arrived at the next station, Guiguinto, into which I limped at 5.30 P.M. sore, weary, and hungry. In the morning I had pocketed a couple of biscuits for lunch, but I had come across an insurgent hid in a clump of bamboo with his leg broken by a bullet. He had almost bled to death and was crying for water and food. After giving him first aid I supplemented it with one of my biscuits which he gratefully devoured.

Guiguinto is on the south side of a wide, deep river with a swift current. The General and staff were on the railway track near the entrance to the iron bridge watching our troops debouch from both sides and slowly pick their way across the river on the iron ties, and incidentally munching chunks of fresh cocoanut passed around by Major J. Franklin Bell (who later became Major-General and Chief of Staff of the United States Army), who had picked up a bag of them as he came through the town.

That scene, with a marvelous Oriental sunset as a background, would have furnished an inspiration to an artist.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

TO ALL WHO SHALL SEE THESE PRESENTS, GREETING.

THIS IS TO CERTIFY THAT THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
PURSUANT TO ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED JULY 9, 1918, HAS AWARDED TO

Henry F. Hoyt

A SILVER STAR FOR GALLANTRY IN ACTION against insurgent forces at Manila, Luzon, Philippine Islands.

March 29, 1902, while serving as major and chief surgeon, 2d

Division, 8th Army Corps, United States Volunteers.

GIVEN UNDER MY HAND AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON

THIS second DAY OF April 1924

RECORDED IN THE OFFICE OF
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

Chas. F. Jones
MAJOR GENERAL
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

Dwight Q. Davis
SECRETARY OF WAR

In an instant that panorama changed and Mausers poured in a rain of bullets from a concealed trench several hundred yards straight away up the railway track. In much less time than it can be told five of our men were killed and thirty-nine wounded, many of them in our vicinity.

At my left stood our debonair Division Adjutant-General, Major Putnam Bradlee Strong, who was shot in his right arm. Between us a few paces behind Lieutenant F. L. Perry, First Colorado Infantry, was struck over the heart with a flattened bullet ricocheted from the bridge and knocked senseless, while Private Albert Shaughnessy, Company E of the Twentieth Kansas Infantry, on my right, was shot through his left leg just below the knee.

While I was attending these casualties Lieutenant Davis of the Navy dashed up with his squad and one of the few machine guns in our army, a Colt's rapid fire, had it jerked across the river on the iron ties, followed almost instantly by a gun from the Utah Battery, and between them they soon silenced the volleys from the insurgents.

The welcome rattle of the little hand-car was now heard, as it conveyed the wounded toward Manila and rations for a hungry army on its return. We dined on hardtack and canned salmon and bivouacked on rice straw spread over the railway station platform.

This affair of March 29, 1899, was doubtless the occasion named in the belated distinction with which I was honored in February, 1925, by order of President Calvin Coolidge, as illustrated in this book.

CHAPTER XXIX

'WITH GENERAL FUNSTON'S COMPLIMENTS'

THE army advanced from Malolos April 25, 1899, and in the forenoon fought the battle of the Bagbag River, a wide, swift stream where the north span of the iron railway bridge had been cut, a spot made historic by Colonel Frederick Funston's swimming from there to the shore, the only swim he ever indulged in during a battle in the Islands, various newspapers to the contrary notwithstanding. The battle was fierce while it lasted, and when it was over there were thirty wounded, four dead, and eleven heat exhaustions of our men, and quite a number of wounded Filipinos, all to be transferred from the north to the south side of the river.

The cut span in the bridge made it impossible to use my hand-car. The insurgents had done away with every craft in sight and my men hunted for some miles up and down the stream before they finally found a small canoe with which, paddled by a Kanaka boy and a Filipino prisoner, I had the casualties brought over one at a time. I directed this movement from the south bank. It was hot. The river swarmed with soldiers enjoying a refreshing swim. One in the middle of the stream in front of me threw up his hands and went down. His comrades, thinking he had been pulled down by a crocodile, swam for shore, excepting two who dived after but could not find him. Two days later the body was recovered, when it was learned that cramps caused the tragedy.

I had given strict orders that the canoe was for casualties only, and when a soldier with his rifle came over with a dead body and climbed the bank I was cross all the way through and reprimanded him sharply. He looked up at me, tears trickled down his face, and pointing to the dead soldier he said in a trembling voice, 'Major, he is my brother.'

Registering a canoe-load of mental chagrin, I am not ashamed to record that I apologized and sent him on his way. Military men will understand, as he was a private.

In 1903 I told the story of this incident to a group in an office at Muskogee, Oklahoma. As I concluded one of them shook hands with me and identified himself as the man I had 'bawled out' on the banks of the Bagbag.

A short distance north of the Bagbag is the Rio Grande de Pampanga, by far the largest stream in that part of Luzon. On its north bank, opposite the town of Calumpit, the insurgent army was strongly entrenched and now commanded by General Antonio Luna. He was the only real military man the insurgents had, and in my three years of active field service in the Islands was the only Filipino general officer I ever saw on a battle-field. He was equipped with artillery and we were facing a real problem. General MacArthur called a council of war, and after discussing the situation stated that there was a Medal of Honor for the man who presented a practical plan for crossing the river. Many times in later years I have heard the late General Frederick Funston's exploits belittled, even by military men. These men always get 'a rise' from me. There were many officers in that army with much longer military experience and training than Funston. Every officer there had the same chance to distinguish himself. April 27, 1899, he won the star of a Brigadier-General by his famous crossing of the Rio Grande on a raft, putting the entire army under General Luna to flight, as all the world knows. He was a big little man.

May 31 the army crossed the Rio Grande, the objective being San Fernando, which was captured and entered May 5 after a hotly contested battle at Santa Tomas the day before. Colonel Funston was wounded there, and while the injury was being dressed he was handed a cablegram by the signal officer, Captain Edgar Russell (who became a Major-General and Chief of the Signal Corps of the entire American forces during the World War), from Washington, promoting him to be a Brigadier-General.

San Fernando was quite a city, built on the north side of a river of that name. It had many beautiful homes, richly furnished. But all were abandoned. A proclamation was issued, however, that soon brought many of the inhabitants back. I utilized most of my spare time in going among them with the strongest American propaganda and did all I could to gain their confidence. My knowledge of conversational Spanish, picked up in the Panhandle, was of immense advantage to me in this work.

I learned that they firmly believed that few Filipinos were killed in battle, but that the American losses were enormous. Aguinaldo had a portable printing press on a bull-cart and issued a daily edition of war statistics, every word of which the natives believed. We found these bulletins scattered along the entire route — or should I say rout? According to Aguinaldo's figures the United States was almost depopulated, killed in battle by his brave Filipinos.

This information I imparted to General MacArthur one day in the presence of General Funston, now commanding our First Brigade, and suggested that after the next scrap — they were attacking us every few days — we bury their dead in the cemetery right in San Fernando as an object lesson, instead of on the battle-field as was customary.

In my copy of my official reports I find that we were attacked in considerable force June 16, 1899, most heavily in front of the First Brigade. We had one man killed and fifteen wounded. The Filipinos had thirty wounded and fifty-nine dead. This very unusual proportion between wounded and dead was due to the fact that they always had about four men to a gun and made the most strenuous efforts to remove all casualties as fast as they occurred.

This affair was on our left, some distance away, and I did not get out to it. A soldier entered, saluted and said, 'I have something for the Major downstairs with General Funston's compliments.' I stepped to the window and saw a strange sight. At the curb in front of our headquarters, the beautiful home of a wealthy planter, stood two Government wagons with sideboards, each filled with dead Filipinos. It was a gruesome spectacle. General Funston had evidently remembered my suggestion and had done his part. Most of the San Fernando refugees had returned and the street was filled with natives very much surprised and excited. Never again did they accept the report of no Filipino losses in battle.

I sent for a large squad of prisoners, who dug a long deep grave in the cemetery, but when ordered to transfer their dead comrades from the wagons they absolutely refused. I learned that for some superstitious reason they never touched with their hands a body killed in battle. With ropes, however, they did the work readily enough.

While at San Fernando we had a number of guests. Senator Albert J. Beveridge visited us for nearly a week. I had just established the first Field Hospital in the Islands by selecting five commodious houses adjoining and connecting them in the rear by a sheltered bamboo porch. Mr. Beveridge several times visited my new hospital. He visited the firing lines also with all the nonchalance of a veteran, and all in all he proved to be a very welcome visitor. He delivered a notable speech in the United States Senate July 9, 1900, on the 'Policy of the Philippines' and in referring to the climate mentioned me as his authority.

An ambulance brought four young physicians from Johns Hopkins University, Simon Flexnor, Llewelyn F. Barker, Joseph Flint, and W. F. Jay, to study tropical diseases. Like most young Americans they were wild to get a taste of real war at the front, and I made it my business to see that they did. As I remember, they acted also as vets and I was quite proud of my company.

Conditions at San Fernando were ideal if one wished to show a visitor just how it looked and felt to be on a real 'firing line.' The enemy were strongly entrenched but a short distance away on three sides of us. All that was necessary to start something was to walk or ride a short distance beyond our outposts. The Filipinos did the rest. I should also add that it was not always necessary to throw out bait.

They were fighters, and if they had been trained as marksmen as is the average American, we should be fighting them yet, if there were any of us left. That little bantam-lightweight champion boxer — Pancho Villa I think was his name — is a good representative of the race.

Aguinaldo, suffering a continuous performance of defeat, forced the population of each city, town, or village to evacuate as his army retreated, after setting fire to their homes and buildings. He had read of the historic victory due to the burning of Moscow and aspired to the title of Alexander I of Russia, as well as to that of the 'George Washington of the Philippines,' as he was already called by his people, but he had overlooked the difference in climatic conditions and no one suffered from his bonfires but the poor natives.

Where they disappeared to or how they subsisted for a time would be difficult to say. They were so cocksure of victory that no thought of defeat was even dreamed of. It all came so suddenly they could carry but little of their belongings in their precipitous flights and millions of dollars' worth of their personal property was abandoned.

Fortunately for them our advance was so rapid that this incendiary plan was necessarily incomplete. It was certainly pathetic to enter these abandoned communities and find the utmost confusion of every kind of household goods, clothing, silverware, beautiful paintings, all kinds of musical instruments, including pianos and harps, strewn about and scattered in every direction.

Under Spanish rule, if the native prospered, some charge would be trumped up against him, he would be thrown into the famous Bilibid Prison, his wealth confiscated and he himself forgotten. Therefore they concealed their funds as best they could, avoiding banks as they would rattlesnakes.

The Mexican peso was the most common medium of exchange, and as this is both heavy and bulky, many thousands of them were left during this exodus. When Malolos was captured several large safes were found, in the Treasury building of the Philippine Republic, containing a considerable sum in silver and a lot of valuable bonds, etc., showing how confident they were of victory.

After the return of many of the inhabitants, an old Chinese merchant came one day asking that he be allowed to take some money to Manila in a box-car I had fitted up as a hospital car, fearing robbery if he took it in the usual way. I consented, and down he came in a vehicle with five good-sized baskets of pesos, amounting to thousands of dollars. General Lloyd Wheaton, commanding a brigade in our division at San Fernando, selected for his headquarters a beautiful residence adjoining General MacArthur's. On the ground floor was a fine billiard table on a very handsome tile floor. After confidence was restored and people were returning, the owner of this property appeared with a retinue of peons one day and requested authority to 'remove some of his property,' which was granted.

Under the eyes of our soldiers the peons dug up a section of the floor under the billiard table and took out some twenty thousand pesos!

CHAPTER XXX

HOME AND BACK AGAIN

DURING the advance from Malolos I was seized with a severe attack of amœbic dysentery. I gradually grew weaker until we reached San Fernando, where, on July 25, 1899, after fainting away, I had a conference with General MacArthur and decided to go to a hospital on Corregidor Island at the entrance of Manila Bay. Major G. F. Shiels, Brigade Surgeon, was announced as my successor.

I had, however, delayed too long, and in spite of the best of care and treatment grew slowly worse. A consultation was held and I was ordered home on sick leave and sailed August 23 on the good ship Valencia commanded by Captain Lane.

The change and sea air did wonders and I began to gain strength at once. The day we arrived at Nagasaki we encountered a terrific typhoon in which several thousand Japanese fishermen were caught out and drowned.

After a stop-over of two days, the anchor was weighed, steam on, and the ship just beginning to swing around, when we were signaled to stop by an official launch that dashed alongside. Two Japanese officers, in full dress, brass buttons, gilt trimmings galore, and armed with guns and swords, came up the rope-ladder and over the rail like acrobats.

‘What’s the matter, gentlemen?’ says Captain Lane.

‘You no pay ze laundry bill,’ was the reply.

‘!!!!!!!?’ says the captain, turning to his first officer, who replied, ‘Wait a moment,’ and went below. Returning with a large bundle he spread out on the deck five white uniforms absolutely ruined. They were full of holes and discolored in spots, evidently the result of some strong acid or other chemical.

With a disgusted look and a wave of his hand toward the exhibit, Captain Lane indicated that the incident was closed. But not much! With a most elaborate Oriental salaam accompanied with a shrug of the shoulders and a gesture of his hands — such as may be seen occasionally on the East Side, New York City — the little official said, 'You pay ze bill o' you no go. If you like you sue ze laundry man' — just like that. 'Ze bill' was paid.

As the departing officers slid over the rail I asked Captain Lane what would have happened if he had refused to pay up. Pointing to a battery of big guns on the side of a mountain overlooking the harbor, he replied, 'They'd have blown the ship out of the water with one volley.'

The United States Transport Valencia had on board a regiment of American soldiers, the First Montana Volunteer Infantry. I wonder if an incident like this could have happened with people of any other nation in the world? I thought of the little Japanese officer making a governmental report of the effect of a battle on his pulse.

The Valencia, some years later, was shipwrecked and lost on the west coast between San Francisco and Alaska. I landed at San Francisco September 24, and rejoined my family in Chicago four days later.

Near the end of my leave of absence I learned that the United States Transport Thomas was to sail in a few days from New York to Manila via the Suez Canal, and wired the Secretary of War for permission to return to duty on that ship. My request was promptly granted and I climbed up the gangway of that fine vessel the morning of November 3. On board was the Forty-Seventh Regiment, Volunteer Infantry, commanded by Colonel Walter Howe. Being fresh from the Philippine campaign I was a welcome guest, as but few of that command had ever experienced real war.

The Transport Thomas — just remodeled at the Cramp Shipyard — was very much in the news and was visited that morning by a party of New York ladies whom I assisted in escorting in a route of inspection over the vessel. Among them were Mrs. Russell Sage and Miss Helen Gould.

During the day I renewed my friendship with Major Putnam Bradlee Strong and Captain Francis Burton Harrison, and in the evening, still having a few drops of sporting blood left, I watched Jim Jeffries knock out Sailor Sharkey in twenty-five rounds at Coney Island.

After a most delightful voyage the Thomas arrived at Manila the last week in December, 1899. I found many changes had occurred during my absence. Aguinaldo's army, after sustaining numerous defeats without a single victory to its credit, disbanded, hid their rifles, and for the next two years a real guerrilla war was on. During the war many letters from American soldiers describing the Filipino people were published in their home newspapers. These sometimes came back to the Islands and were seen by the natives. At first they were amused, but eventually became indignant at continually being described as savages, head-hunters, and even cannibals.

Before the war began I had met and known many of the better class of the people of Manila. A few days after my return to Manila I was waited upon by a number of my former acquaintances and presented with a photograph of a group of typical Filipino ladies of the gente fino class of Manila, dressed in their national costume. I was earnestly requested to have this circulated among my friends in America, that they might see for themselves that all Filipinos were not savages. A copy of this photograph is shown in this volume and speaks for itself. Thirty years have passed since it was taken and it might provoke a smile from the Manila flappers of to-day, but I doubt very much if they could produce a better picture.

General MacArthur had become Military Governor of the Islands. General Frederick Dent Grant had arrived and at his request I was assigned as Chief Surgeon on his staff and at once reported for duty at his headquarters at Angeles, a station on the Manila-Dagupan Railway, some distance north of San Fernando.

The guerrilla war was a succession of ambushes and night attacks by the enemy and retaliatory raids by the Americans. To obtain reliable knowledge of the situation General Grant called a meeting, at Malolos, of the heads of the municipalities in his district — which embraced the most populous and wealthy section of Luzon. At this conference the Filipinos informed the General 'that they had all signed a document with their own blood, never to submit to any government but their own.' Thanking them for their frankness and stating in substance that he was glad to know just where they stood, General Grant adjourned the meeting and began active preparations for war. Wearying of having his troops chasing bushwhackers through tropical jungles on foot, he made request for and was supplied with about four hundred broncos from Oregon, and after he organized what was known as 'Grant's Mounted Scouts' the war became another story. In all official and War Department records this remarkable organization appears as 'Fifth District Scouts.'

One of these 'hikes' was in the rainy season, lasting over twenty days, during which there was a daily down-pour, with one exception. On this hike we discovered, captured, and destroyed over a million pounds of rice, concealed in almost inaccessible strongholds high up in the mountains, together with a considerable quantity of various military supplies. During these hikes both officers and men shared alike in food, shelter, and hardships.

FILIPINO SOCIETY LADIES IN THEIR NATIONAL COSTUME, 1899

A GROUP OF IGORROTE WARRIORS FROM NORTHERN LUZON

One day we were on a jungle hike following a sinuous trail, single file, that brought us to a boggy spot, and after plunging through it, the General and staff halted to see that all crossed in good shape. After about a hundred had passed, the bog, especially in one spot, became almost bottomless and warning was passed back the line. Finally a trooper's horse in crossing became unmanageable, and while floundering both horse and rider went down out of sight in the mud. Struggling out, the soldier paused a moment to wipe the mud from his eyes, and taking one look at himself and the horse, he remarked, 'Damned if I seed any pictur like this in the office whar I 'listed!'

Even General Grant, stern-faced in war, got a good laugh.

On one of our night raids we were on a jungle trail more or less muddy most of the way. With foliage and vines meeting above us, intensifying the darkness, our progress was slow. The General preceded me on an iron-gray horse which I could see but dimly and I was closely followed by my orderly. A drooping vine jerked off my cork helmet, and as it struck the mud just behind my horse I called to the orderly to pick it up. He didn't see it or hear me and the helmet sank deep in the mud under his horse's hoof. My temper was usually under control, but this was too much and I warmed up the atmosphere with some real old Panhandle profanity. Next day after dinner the adventure was being discussed when, turning to me with a droll expression, General Grant remarked, 'Doctor, I have known you some time and was under the impression that you were a very pious man, but last night I changed my mind.'

Some distance from Angeles stands, in the center of a fertile plain, an extinct volcano, Mount Arayat, a beautiful majestic peak, almost a perfect cone, and covered with a dense tropical forest. In an almost inaccessible part the insurgents established a supply dépôt defended by a large garrison in a position they thought impregnable, part of the approach to it being the bed of a winding mountain stream where they could ambush an attacking enemy in a hundred places.

Through the medium of their signal corps, the pounding of a club against a tree-trunk, producing a booming sound that carried a long distance, the Filipinos were kept advised of our movements, and often sallied out, ambushing our supply trains, and other small bands of troops. In one of these attacks they had captured five Americans.

Their stronghold, long a secret, was finally found, stormed, and captured by our troops — one of the most remarkable achievements accomplished during the guerilla war. The stronghold was built on the edge of a sixty-foot precipice. Just before they abandoned this place the insurrectos dragged out the five starved, emaciated, and manacled Americans, placed them on their knees along its edge, shot them, and bolo-ed them.

Three were dead, but two managed to roll off the edge and, their fall being arrested by shrubs along the wall, they reached the bottom still alive and were tenderly taken to the hospital at Angeles.

They hovered between life and death for weeks, but finally recovered. The surgeon that brought them back was First Lieutenant P. C. Fauntleroy.

They were kept in a private room and their recovery kept secret. In all the publicity given this affair at the time the entire five were reported killed. Commissary Sergeant Christian Peterson and Private Edward H. Norvell of Company B, Twelfth United States Infantry, Privates Joseph E. Cook, C. C. Cook, and Brown of Company B, Ninth United States Infantry, were the names of these unfortunate heroes. The two first named were the survivors.

Later General Aquina, who commanded this stronghold, was captured and tried before a military commission for murder. He positively testified that he ordered the Americans released and then fled (excepting Antonio Luna, all Filipino generals led retreats), but a major commanding the rear guard had committed this atrocious crime, with a squad, all of whom he later court-martialed and shot. At the completion of his testimony a dramatic scene was presented. The two supposedly dead victims were carried in and gave their testimony. They had been dragged to the edge of the precipice, shot down with one volley, followed by a second, by the order and in the presence of this perjured man, who, to make sure his work was complete, personally attended to the golpe de gracia (stroke of mercy) by having them carved up with bolos. General Aquina received the punishment he deserved.

The gallant assault and capture of Fort Camansi was by Companies B, K, and L, Twenty-Fifth United States Infantry (colored), commanded by Captain Leonhaeuser. It was a remarkable performance and deserves unstinted praise.

As a rule, General Grant and his staff accompanied these punitive expeditions, but missed that one, which was fought January 6, 1900, on account of being on an inspecting tour in another part of the district.

CHAPTER XXXI

RAIDS, HUNTS, AND HOUSE-PARTIES

BUT we did not play the game of war all the time. We lived in a beautiful house where many visitors were attracted by the hospitality and social qualities of General Grant, who was also fond of week-end and house-parties selected from his numerous friends at Manila.

A delightful house-party was held at the Angeles headquarters, the guests including the reigning belles at Manila, the two beautiful daughters of Judge Henry Clay Ide, member of the Taft Civil Commission, who later became Governor-General when Mr. Taft was appointed Secretary of War. Other members of the party were two charming New York girls, Miss Margaret Astor Chandler and a Miss Livingstone, on a trip around the world, and Judge George R. Harvey, wife and son, and others whose names are forgotten. Mrs. Harvey is my sister. General Grant, never having seen Fort Camansi, arranged for the party a picnic in the vicinity of this wild picturesque scene of tragedy and battle. The party was escorted by a strong body of his mounted scouts, and the ladies were transported in ambulances. Miss Anna Ide (who later married W. Bourke Cockran) decided she preferred to go on horseback. A Filipino racing pony was brought with a Whitman saddle which she mounted sidewise, having no riding habit, and we were off. On account of the dust I suggested to Miss Ide that we take the point. After passing the ambulances and the long column of troopers at a lively gait until we led, I called to her to slow down. But she kept right on. Thinking she did not hear me, I spurred up to overtake her. My mount, a good American horse, but not fast, was unable to lessen the distance between us and it dawned on me that her pony was running away.

Turning in my saddle I saw that the first man behind was a handsome young surgeon I had detailed with the scouts. Knowing he had by far the speediest horse in our District, I yelled to him to overtake Miss Ide, as her horse was running away, and he passed me almost as if I were standing still. I kept on at top speed, and to my wonder the young surgeon—whom I had already visualized as a life-saver riding to a romantic dénouement—instead of catching or stopping Miss Ide's pony, flew on past, and my romance faded. He had hardly passed her when I saw her sway in her saddle, and the same instant a swerve of her mount threw her to the left, headlong into the jungle skirting the trail. I reached her first. She was unconscious and had sustained a fracture and dislocation of an arm and wrist. Giving her first-aid treatment, I carried her back to Angeles and sent her home. It appeared that as the surgeon came up behind the pony, his own horse began to swerve, so he kept on with the idea of getting ahead, blocking the trail with his horse, and stopping the runaway, a plan that would have failed even if Miss Ide had not been thrown, as her pony would have dashed into the jungle. If my surgeon had ever been a cowboy with his fast horse he would have made a wonderful rescue.

That the reader may realize that these house-party mounted escorts were not for show only, I will tell of a jaunt to Porac, a small town some distance from Angeles. It had been captured and recaptured several times and now was supposed to be pro-American. It was a picturesque spot, the town built on both sides of a beautiful mountain stream, and had never been visited by a white woman.

Sending word to the Presidente that on a certain day a party of Americans would call and pay their respects, General Grant, with the usual escort, took a house-party, and after a ride through all kinds of tropical scenery landed at Porac, where we were received with the utmost cordiality and hospitality. Natives had flocked from everywhere to see the mujeres blancas (white women). A splendid collation was served, each guest receiving a unique menu, made by a barefoot native with his pen coached in his English and spelling, not entirely successfully, by a soldier in the small garrison there, his artistic sketch on each a bit different. Barring his natural artistic talent and dexterity with a pen he was totally uneducated.

A very excellent native band discoursed sweet music and after the feast provided the music for a gran baile (grand ball) in our honor. They had even shipped ice from Manila, nearly a hundred miles away, for the champagne.

After all this peaceful, delightful affair, when about halfway home, the advance guard, under Lieutenant Chauncey B. Humphrey, was vigorously attacked by a strong force, which were quickly put to flight with considerable loss, but with no casualties on our side. In looking over the war reports I found no mention of ladies being behind this affair.

Three young American bachelors of prominent families, Stephen B. Elkins, Jr., of West Virginia, W. S. Wheeler, of Philadelphia, and Earle Alexander, of Elizabeth, New Jersey, supplementing a visit to the Paris Exposition by a trip around the world, landed one day at Angeles.

Among other entertainments they were given a grand hunt on Mount Arayat after deer and wild boar, of which there were plenty in the great canyons and almost impassable jungle forests of that mountain. I describe this, as it was about the most interesting sport I had ever enjoyed, although I had been after game during the seasons every year since I was big enough to handle a gun. In addition to the game mentioned there were monkeys, parrots, and the jungle fowl, the latter a beautiful bird from whence evolved the domestic fowl.

Don Luciano, the Alcalde (mayor or justice of the peace) of San Pedro Magalang, a small barrio (village) at the west foot of Mount Arayat, was notified by General Grant to prepare for a hunt. We arrived at the barrio the evening before the day set for the hunt, and found Don Luciano had provided quite an entertainment in our honor. An orchestra of fifteen pieces gave us a concert during a dinner of six or eight courses and kept it up till bedtime.

The preliminaries had all been arranged and we had nothing to do but enjoy ourselves. At four o'clock in the morning our slumbers were broken by musical blasts from a hunting horn, made from the horn of the carabao (water buffalo). While waiting for horses to be saddled, after a breakfast of eggs, fried potatoes, bread, butter, bananas, oranges, and coffee, we found a small army ready, seventy-five natives, thirty carabao packing hunting nets, and over one hundred dogs. As we appeared the natives, each carrying a bolo, at once fell into line and saluted, showing conclusively they were ex-insurgent soldiers. In addition to our orderlies and my hospital steward, we had come with an escort of only ten troopers. A big bolo hitched to a native in the jungle is bad medicine, and as I knew we should later be strung out some distance apart and as I had been 'close up' with the Oriental character for two years, I began to feel just a little dubious, commonly called scared. Glancing around I saw several upright hardwood posts, each about the size of a man, portions of the ruins of a sugar mill. They were in line to the right of the natives and about fifty yards distant.

An observer would naturally think I was unarmed, as I usually carried my Mauser pistol concealed, and not wishing the natives to think I might be an easy mark, I decided to give them an object lesson. There was a light spot about the size of a man's hand on the flat side of one of the posts facing me, and jerking my gun from under my left arm I put ten bullets into that spot as fast as I could pull the trigger, shooting as accurately as when I used to knock down the beer bottles behind Howard & McMasters' store in the Panhandle with Billy the Kid.

As I anticipated, this diversion astonished them, and, although the Malay is more or less stoical, they quickly broke ranks and crowded around my target chattering like magpies, evidently impressed as much as I could wish.

My 'object lesson' was doubtless unnecessary, but it did no harm, and one can never tell.

The 'hunting nets' were constructed of hempen cordage a half-inch in diameter, four-inch mesh, six feet high, and fifty feet long. The mountain we found intersected with trails of loggers where the logs were dragged down by carabao tandem teams, and one of these was selected by the cazador (head hunter) who directed the pitching of the nets as the carabao passed along. One after another the nets were securely fastened in an upright position to the foliage edging the trail, and when all were up they formed a six-foot fence of at least a half-mile in length, with a native stationed at each section.

All this was accomplished with military precision, the cazador giving his orders partly with his horn and partly by strange shrill cries that could be heard for a long distance through the forest.

All our party had noticed the military manner of the natives and their unexpected numbers, and on our way to the mountain we quietly decided on a plan of distributing ourselves along the line to our best advantage in case of treachery and arranged what action to take. We were placed along the line at regular intervals a short distance inside the net by the cazador, I between my orderly and hospital steward. While not so very far apart we could not see each other for the dense jungle growth. Our men carried Krag carbines in addition to revolvers.

During these preparations the remaining natives with the dogs made a détour around the mountain several miles, and after forming a line paralleling the nets, slowly advanced toward us, both men and canines making all the noise they could, which drove the game in our direction. It was understood that all shooting at game must be directed toward the beaters, never toward each other. The natives behind the nets carried the bolo, in addition to a savage-looking spear eight feet long. Their function was to spear or cut up any game that became tangled in the net after being wounded or missed by the hunters.

It was not long after the unearthly din from the beaters and dogs reached us before we began to hear noises in every direction, putting us on the alert and tense with anticipation. As no one could see through the undergrowth more than ten to fifteen paces, there were thrills aplenty when a wild boar would tear through everything before him with a noise like a threshing machine. They are very dangerous animals, and with five-inch tusks in the lower jaw and three-inch in the upper, they can quickly tear a hunter to pieces unless he kills them first or is an agile tree-climber.

Like the rattlesnake, a boar definitely advertises his advent, and if the hunter is doubtful as to his skill there is always a handy tree in a jungle. Deer are just the opposite, gracefully gliding through the forest with scarcely a sound. I was very ambitious to bag a boar, but was disappointed. I could very easily fake a fine adventure here, but am under contract to write a true story; so that's that.

After quite a wait I was gladdened by sounds indicating that a boar, pursued by a pack of dogs, was crashing through in my direction. I took up a position under a tree, with a very convenient overhanging limb, and with my Mauser pistol full of dumdum bullets—which we used when hunting—was quite prepared for developments.

But, to my great disappointment, just before entering my area of vision, the animal turned at an angle, dashed straight away to my orderly, who, after missing two good shots at point-blank range, took to a tree, while the big brute, landing in the net, was quickly assassinated by the native on guard. The trophies of this drive were three boars and four deer.

A certain blast from the horn indicating the hunt was over, we assembled in a beautiful spot on a mountain stream, with water cool and clear as crystal, where we made camp and with ravenous appetites enjoyed a toothsome tiffin provided by our host while the beaters were packing the nets and other impedimenta on the carabao. Then with the game added to their burdens, the small army of ex-insurgents—whose anticipated treachery we had forgotten—the numerous canines, together with our cavalcade, made a motley procession.

We arrived at Don Luciano's at 6 P.M., tired and hungry as wolves. Game was quickly dressed, and in a short time we were enjoying wild pig chops, venison, sweet potatoes, fresh tomatoes, radishes, lettuce, fried bananas, guava jelly, and coffee, in a way that was no trouble to us.

A young wild pig is simply delicious, but not the old ones. All the game, excepting two saddles each of venison and wild hog, was turned over to the natives, who soon had a grand fiesta going, winding up with a baile. To offset our suspicions of their loyalty, General Grant gave them a talk, our host interpreting, after which we distributed one hundred pesetas (ten dollars gold) among them, thus furnishing a climax to a wonderful day, on both sides, no doubt handed down by their traditions to the present time.

The late famous writer and traveler, Frank G. Carpenter, arrived at Angeles just as we were starting on an important hike, and, by invitation of General Grant, gladly joined us. The objective was a secret cache of rice and war munitions, supposed to be located somewhere up a very remarkable and hard-to-get-at canyon called 'Ypo,' away up Mount Ariod, quite a distance from Angeles. At one time our trail was the bed of a tortuous mountain stream, the luxuriant foliage on the sides forming a veritable tunnel over us, for a distance of five miles. This proved to be a very successful adventure, as the cache was finally discovered and nearly a half-million pounds of rice, many guns, and considerable ammunition were destroyed.

We were shot up a number of times, once while at the bottom of a very deep canyon, the enemy on both sides at the top blazing away at an almost vertical range. It was here one of the mounted scouts received a very unique wound, the first of its kind in history and the source of one of my best surgical stories.

The bullet, from a Mauser, entering his face, between the cheek-bone and nose, passed through the hard palate, thence through his entire body, finally coming out just in front of the lower end of the spine. Remarkable as it may seem, this man recovered and was again on the firing line within a month.

In narrating this extraordinary incident, at any indication of incredulity or doubt from my listeners, I would at once explain, but, if my story was swallowed, as the soldier did the bullet, I always let it go at that.

This hike occurred in November, 1900, and Mr. Carpenter pronounced it the outstanding adventure of his entire life. The day after our return I gave him another. Don Florentino Paumintuan—musical name, don't you think?—whose home was our headquarters, like most wealthy natives had a secret cache for his silver and other valuables. He also had a billiard table on the ground floor, under which was an invisible trapdoor that opened by a spring near by. I had dubbed it the 'crawl cache,' as we entered this door on hands and knees and after descending two or three steps crawled along the ground, under the floor three feet above, some little distance to an opening, where a pair of stairs took us into a subterranean apartment about fifteen feet below the surface, where on the floor were a number of large ollas, now empty. Some of our soldiers could have spun a yarn about this cache when the town was captured.

We had each lighted a candle as we started downstairs, but our visit was very, very short, as a young boa constrictor was trying to tag something among the vessels. No traffic cop was present, so the going was 'on high.' At our first, and last, glance the snake seemed to be about fifty feet long, but friend Frank and the 'Red Doctor' were both too busy trying to get through that door at the same time, to measure him.

If Frank had been ~~my~~ my size, we might both have been stuck in that door yet, but he was very slender and wiry, and the way we eeled it up those stairs and out was a caution. It was my first and last subterranean sprint and brought to my memory my adventure with a snake in the Panhandle of Texas in the long ago, as previously told.

I never did have much real affection for a snake — except as an emergency ration. Later our boa was captured and turned loose in the attic as a rat-catcher. He was a youngster and only about six feet long.

CHAPTER XXXII

A TYPICAL HIKE AFTER GUNS

THE educated Tagálo, the leaders of the country, are haughty, dignified, proud, deceitful, and cruel, yet withal they are the acme of polished politeness, hospitable, and brave in their way with a strong complex of mystery and intrigue of all kinds.

Their guerrilla tactics, while simple, were effective. To Americans at this time all natives looked alike. When their army disbanded in 1899, the insurgents repaired to their respective homes, concealing weapons and uniforms, and appearing in the white habiliments of peace were apparently from that time a harmless peaceful paisanaje (peasantry), but under the surface and behind the scenes conditions were reversed.

They divided the country into districts, each under the command of the ranking insurgent officer who resided within its boundaries. Each district had its secret rendezvous, where the patriots, armed and in uniform, assembled at regular intervals, usually at night. When attending these meetings each attached a small package to his belt containing a white coat and trousers, and if a force of Americans were encountered our 'brown barefoot brethren of the beach' would vanish in the jungle and 'presto change,' would emerge innocent amigos clad in white.

As they were past-masters in double-dealing and deception, this was easy for a time. They had learned they were safe in meeting Americans unless armed and in uniform. One of their bag o' tricks was to apply a certain bruised herb to a man's back that would raise a crop of harmless swellings resembling welts. He would appear at our headquarters with a pitiful tale of being badly whipped by his people for befriending us, show up his back as proof, and offer to guide us to a secret location where many guns were kept, all in revenge for his punishment.

Out we would go and after we had silently stolen after him for miles through the wildest roughest country in the world, he would suddenly vanish in the jungle and leave us to get home the best we could. It was an Oriental imitation of our old 'snipe game' in the Panhandle, as described previously.

We were not always beaten at the game, however. It was known that in the heart of one of the richest sugar districts was a favorite rendezvous of the guerrillas, but all plans to surprise them in action or break it up had failed.

It was sugar-harvest time and long trains of the two-wheeled squeaking carts with bamboo mat awnings and drawn by carabao, were transporting sugar to market, often at night on account of the cooler temperature. Getting reliable information of a meeting night at this rendezvous, a detachment of scouts secretly and silently stole away in the darkness and were fortunate enough to overtake a sugar train en route for the same barrio. Holding it up, the drivers were compelled to shift their cargoes from sugar to scouts, and comfortably reclining under the awnings the latter proceeded on their way. The frightened drivers, well knowing that treachery or disobedience of orders meant instant death, slowly but surely conducted the train within a short distance of the meet, when, at the signal from their leader, the scouts sprang from cover and instantly surrounding the building opened a fusillade through doors and windows. The surprise was complete and the fight soon over. The insurgents surrendered after quite a loss, and the bull-carts were again utilized to convey the scouts and their booty, some twenty guns and other plunder, to Angeles. The survivors were listed and turned loose with a warning that if caught again they would be shot.

One evening at dinner word was quietly passed for the staff to be prepared to take the field at 9 P.M., with emergency rations for one day, destination unknown. Later we learned that with a detail of one hundred mounted scouts we were booked for one of the night raids after guns for which 'Grant's Mounted Scouts' had become famous, a diversion welcome to all.

It is 9 P.M., and the column is off. Angeles was a large pueblo, and in order not to excite the suspicions of the native populace not a move was made out of the ordinary before 8.45, when horses were saddled, carbines and revolvers inspected, all with scarcely a sound until the column dashed away at a gallop, toward a mountain gorge twelve miles away, in a defile of which we hoped to surprise a rendezvous. The rapid start was to prevent advance warning by natives. We galloped a few miles, then slowed down to a steady trot of about six miles an hour.

It was a beautiful tropical night with a brilliant moon just rising as we pulled out, almost bright enough to read by. Would it were possible to describe the beauty of moonlight in Luzon, but it must be seen and its softness actually felt to be appreciated. The first ten miles led through an undulating country broken at intervals by clear rapid streams from the mountain, easily forded and very refreshing to our horses. The trail, a very good one, was fringed with the feathery bamboo, many varieties of stately palms, different kinds of fruit trees, which, with the many varieties of the famous hard woods of the Islands, presented an ever-changing panorama of nature beautiful to behold. At interval breaks in the forest were a vigorous growth of the cogon grass, often rearing its silvery plumes full fifteen feet from the ground, which, gracefully fanned to and fro by the cool night breeze, produced an effect under the shimmering moonlight that was simply indescribable.

Several small barrios were rapidly passed, but all was dark and silent except the angry barking of the dogs, in the number of which, as in number of children, the Filipino excels. Many of the barrios were supplied with tame geese which as alarmists often discount the dog. They detected strangers at night before the dogs did and the alarm they raised left nothing to be desired. That these alarms might not defeat our objective, the men at the point were instructed to lead at a gallop through these barrios and for some distance beyond at the first bark or cackle. Between ten and eleven o'clock the column halted at a barrio in the foothills to commandeer a guide, our men not being acquainted with the trails.

When it was necessary to surprise and round up a barrio in night raids, the scouts were trained to dash in at full speed, the first four falling out to surround the first house, the next four the next house, and so on. These villages are usually built on each side of a main street.

This plan was generally a success in a surprise, but occasionally conditions were reversed, and instead of silence, or surrender, our troops would be received with volleys from the magazine Mauser, after which the insurgents would vanish like phantoms in the forest, the barrio would be burned, and, with casualties, if any, the column would face homeward.

This time the surprise was a success with a completeness and rapidity truly remarkable. Native houses, built of bamboo and elevated on posts several feet from the ground, were entered by a small bamboo ladder. From one of the first information was gained as to the whereabouts of the cabeza (head man) and he was soon brought into the presence of the General. When told what was wanted he produced a stockily built, ugly-looking native who was well posted in all the trails in the vicinity. This chap, after being told that the first sign of treachery or disobedience of orders meant for him instant death, was tied on a pony connected with a rope to a man on the point; and away we went.

We were still advancing in column of twos, but in a short time the trail narrowed and we moved in single file. The First Sergeant, Morris by name, a Westerner, a splendid horseman, a dead shot, in fact, an all-around first-class soldier, was given the post of honor at the front, and right well did he do his duty. Progressing rapidly for a mile after this delay brought the column to a trail so rough and broken that speed was considerably reduced. Progressing thus for a short distance, we came to a sharp angle in the trail which was hardly entered before two shots rang out into the night a few rods from the point, quickly followed by shouts of the men and desultory firing along the advance guard.

The instant the first shots were fired, all put spurs to their horses and the troop dashed forward, but in a few moments firing ceased and at the sight of a dead horse in the trail with prostrate forms beyond, the command halted, and the cause of the fusillade was explained. As the sergeant turned the angle, two mounted men were seen rapidly approaching less than fifty yards away. They both instantly fired at him with revolvers, but missed, and whirling their horses endeavored to escape, shooting over their shoulders as they rode. Unslinging his carbine the instant they fired, Sergeant Morris was after them on one of the best mounts in the troop, his first idea being to capture them, but they, being also splendidly mounted, paid no attention to his challenge to halt, but fled all the faster. Morris then fired and one of the fleeing horses dropped, dashing his rider to the ground. Recovering himself, he sprang to his feet, bravely firing his last shot at the same instant that his brain was pierced by a bullet from the unerring weapon of the sergeant. Without pausing a moment the intrepid soldier leaped his steed over the fallen horse and rider, as they lay in the trail, and had scarcely touched the ground when his deadly carbine crashed for the third time bringing the remaining fugitive to the earth with a mortal wound.

The wounded man survived long enough to reveal that they were insurgent officers with important papers concealed under the peaceful white garb they wore and that they would have surrendered but for them. Their white garments also made better targets under the moonlight than if clad otherwise. The poor fellow must have been turning to fire when shot, as the bullet, in addition to piercing the upper spine, had severed an artery in his neck, and being beyond all aid he soon passed away.

From a military standpoint this exploit of Sergeant Morris in taking the initiative, his instant action, his remarkable skill with the rifle as exhibited by its deadly work while on horseback at full speed under the shadows of night and the fire of his adversaries, was altogether a most brilliant performance and he well earned the hearty commendation bestowed by General Grant. Sergeant Morris is mentioned in War Department records.

Examination of the clothing of the unfortunate men disclosed their commissions as captain and lieutenant in the insurgent army, a map of the very location we were seeking, but, most important of all, a complete roster of their command.

This find was doubly valuable, for, during the rush and excitement incident to the above, the guide either loosened a hand or removed the halter from his pony with his teeth, and they both suddenly disappeared in the jungle, leaving an empty halter and nothing more. A hot fire was poured after him, but it was never known whether it was effective or not.

Leaving the bodies of the officers covered with plantain leaves under a bunch of beautiful palms, with a note in Tagálo directing passing natives to bury them (which later we learned was done), we pressed on with the new-found map as guide.

Silence was enjoined and all communication between the men prohibited except in whispers. Progress became much slower, as the trail abounded in soft spots, pitfalls, slippery roots of trees and vines over which horses frequently fell, impossible to avoid with the impenetrable thorny wall of jungle growth at each side of the narrow trail. This part of the journey was weird and ghostly, for while the moon was shining brightly in the heavens above its rays were so obstructed by the interlacing of the massive growth crowning the crests of the lofty giants of the forest that along the trail all was either fitful deceptive shadows or deep darkness. By the few silvery rays that filtered through, dim outlines of the tree-trunks could be seen, many gigantic in size and height, a perfect maze of vines and creepers surrounding and festooning their bodies or intermingling with their boughs. These, with shadowy ferns rearing their graceful fronds, oftentimes to a height of fifty feet, produce effects that are easily heightened by the imagination into many varieties of fantastic fancies.

But this did not get guns.

The column halts. We wonder why. I can just see General Grant on his iron gray in my front. I press forward and hear a whispered report of a light or camp-fire some distance in front on our left. The General directs that 'the first twenty-five men dismount, every fifth man hold horses while the remainder make a reconnaissance, surround and capture, without bloodshed if possible, all at or in the vicinity of the fire, not a shot to be fired unless absolutely necessary.'

The orders go forward by wireless whisper, while we, filled with suppressed excitement, wait, note the possibility of a near ambush by insurgents concealed in the shadows and dark recesses on every side — happy thoughts which, augmented by the death-rattle voice of the tree lizard and the angry chattering of several families of monkeys disturbed in their lofty nests by the night raiders, all help to keep us awake.

We move forward for some distance when the General receives the report. The light came from a shack in the forest which was silently surrounded and entrance demanded. Excited voices were heard, lights put out, and a man sprang from a window in the rear in a frantic effort to escape, only to fall into the hands of two husky scouts. He surrendered and called to three comrades inside to do the same.

He was a first lieutenant in uniform and all were armed, the place being a sort of outpost. The lieutenant's name was found on the captured roster, and securing him with a lariat fastened to the saddle of the man on the point, he was given the choice of being shot or guiding us to the rendezvous. The latter was his choice, and acting as an infantryman — there being no extra horses — we were soon moving forward again.

It was now past midnight and for two hours or more the trail was one of the most difficult imaginable. Forests, swamps, stretches of cogon grass thick and high, rice paddies in which some horses mired down completely, a wide stream deep enough to necessitate swimming that we crossed twice, mountain spurs and sub-spurs — once for a half-mile the trail being the rocky, broken, tortuous bed of a mountain stream — were all encountered in weary succession. The activity, endurance, and jungle craft displayed by the new guide excited the wonder and admiration of us all.

Entering an imposing-looking canyon about three in the morning, he stopped and announced the goal was near by. Placing him with a guard to join his comrades when they came up with the rear, the signal to charge was sent down the line.

A night attack upon an unknown, unseen foe in a strange country requires courage. Would they fight or run was the outstanding question in the minds of the determined men charging up the valley of the canyon. All hoped for the former and were eager for the fray, all toil and hardship incident to the long march forgotten as they thundered into the clearing under the excitement of anticipated battle. But they were doomed to disappointment, as everything in the vicinity was silent as the grave and apparently deserted.

There was one large building, probably a barracks, and a number of smaller ones, each of which was instantly surrounded in the usual way. The large one was entered first by a detail, and to their surprise was filled with occupants and the same was found to obtain in the smaller. They were brought out in squads to a level place, evidently a drill ground, and proved to be over one hundred men and fifty women and children.

Men were in white, and not a weapon of any kind was found. We learned that we had been followed by runners and during the delay at the forest outpost one, worming his way through the jungle near enough to overhear the orders to the guide, took a short cut to the rendezvous and sounded the alarm. Deciding our column was too strong to attack, weapons were concealed, and but for the women and children the men would have also vanished.

The men were lined up and all denied ever having been soldiers. Guns? Never had seen one until we came.

During the campaign of 1899, prisoners reported great dissatisfaction in Aguinaldo's ranks, and our Government at the suggestion of General MacArthur tried an experiment, offering thirty pesos (fifteen dollars gold) for every gun brought in, but the response was disappointing. The majority that did arrive were damaged and practically worthless; consequently the large bulk of their guns were finally captured during the more than two years of guerrilla war by just such raids as I am describing.

Very noticeable in the motley line was a lad of about fifteen — handsome, his appearance and bearing much different from the rest. Hearing him reply to the interpreter's questions in Spanish, I interviewed him myself, and learning he was the son of the cabeza, who was away, became convinced he knew all about the gun question. I urged him strongly to tell me the truth, but he was still positive in his denials of any knowledge of guns or other military munitions.

In the mean time our lieutenant guide — who apparently had suddenly become pro-American — had segregated about thirty of his countrymen declaring them to be soldiers. Dismayed they tremblingly fell to their knees, praying and begging for their lives, evidently expecting to be executed on the spot.

The guide then energetically urged the young lad to tell the truth, but the youngster was game. He stood facing us without a tremor in the moonlight, his remarkable nerve exciting the secret admiration of all, denying emphatically any knowledge of concealed weapons.

At a signal from Lieutenant Burr, scout commander, the brave little fellow was taken to one side, bound hand and foot and lashed to a tree. A squad of scouts were drawn up a few paces in front of him where they were ordered to 'make ready, take aim,' but before the order to 'fire!' Burr, watch in hand, said in Spanish, 'My boy, if your memory does not come back in two minutes you will be shot dead!'

It was a sight and scene not easily forgotten. To me, twenty-nine years later, it is still as vivid as if it were yesterday. Burr counted the minutes by halves with a voice vibrating with the solemnity of the occasion, and at the beginning of the last half the boy's nerve broke and, begging for his life, he promised to tell the truth.

He was quickly released and this incident resulted in over twenty-five rifles, in good condition, together with a considerable quantity of ammunition and war bolos, being dragged from concealment. They were mostly hidden in the hollow of the bamboo, where they are easily concealed and kept dry.

Had he remained silent, the boy, of course, would not have been shot, but in that event the raid would have been very close to a failure, and while the measures taken looked cruel, the end justified the means.

Knowing that to remain meant certain death, this boy and the lieutenant guide were taken with us as we returned to Angeles, and they took the oath of allegiance, the boy later being the means of our capturing over one hundred guns. Mario was his name. We learned early in 1899 that any native favoring us in any way was doomed to die if he fell into the hands of his people.

Both by heredity and training they are cruel to the limit, as shown by their methods of punishment. Leaving a victim bound hand and foot across a giant anthill, burying them alive, casting them into a pit to be impaled on the points of upright sharpened bamboo were a few of their favorite modes.

A good deal has been published in this good old country of ours about the cruelties inflicted upon the Filipino during the war by the American soldier. I have strong opinions in favor of humane measures. My profession, followed for over fifty years, demonstrates that; but there are exceptions to all rules, and after four years of active field service in the Philippines I know that if it had not been for our stern measures and an occasional 'bluff,' as above described, the insurrectos would still have guns and we should be fighting them yet.

The 'soldiers' taken in this raid were marched back as prisoners of war and placed in a military prison. Under ordinary conditions escorting thirty prisoners was a comparatively simple proposition, but marching them single file through a tropical jungle is another story.

Our captives were divided into squads of ten, each man fastened by his neck to a rope, which was then secured to the saddles of two scouts, and the long tramp to Angeles was made without further incident.

I have entered into more detail than usual in describing this affair, that my readers may realize something of the nature of the experiences and duties of the American soldier serving in a war with a strange people, on the other side of the world and under conditions unique in our military history. This affair was selected, as it was a typical hike.

CHAPTER XXXIII

AN ATTEMPTED TOBACCO CURE

I WAS associated with General Frederick Dent Grant for over two years under conditions of all kinds and I always found him the same kind-hearted, courteous gentleman. While I was with him at Chickamauga Park in June, 1898, he was taken very ill and was joined by Mrs. Grant, who assisted in nursing him. She, a very charming woman, was naturally very solicitous as to his health, and during our consultations his habit of smoking was discussed. After giving her my opinion, she entreated me to use my influence to induce the General to stop, which I gladly promised to do.

In a short time I was promoted and sent to Anniston, Alabama, and did not see General Grant again until I joined him in Angeles, Philippine Islands. I do not remember ever seeing him without a cigar in his mouth except when he was eating or asleep. I took every opportunity that offered to drop a suggestion that seemed timely, hoping to open his eyes to the truth about tobacco as I saw it. One would think this unnecessary after observing the fate of his illustrious father, whose life — as all the world knows — was shortened by this filthy, poisonous weed.

I began to see light ahead when one day he informed me that he had been seriously considering this matter of tobacco, and had decided to make an effort to stop using it. He had for years averaged not less than twenty cigars a day, and as a starter was going to begin the reformation by cutting that number right in two, and was now smoking but ten.

This pleased me very much, and I hoped for another cut soon. I was away for a few days, and when I saw him again I asked if he was holding out all right. He replied in the affirmative and, with a twinkle in his eye, held up his tenth cigar for the day, that he had just lighted. It was just twice the size of any cigar I had ever seen.

A large cigar factory in Manila had introduced a new brand, naming it after General Grant and sending him several complimentary boxes. His reformation stopped, and like his father he passed away long before his time.

I realized early in my career the danger from tobacco, and for more than forty years have advocated the idea that it is more harmful to the health and longevity of the human race than alcohol.

The remarkable activity and success of the mounted scouts began to bear fruit. That band of leaders that defied General Grant at Malolos, with their dramatic tale of signing papers with their blood never to submit to any government but their own, were weary of war and now came in again, this time under a white flag and, figuratively speaking, on their hands and knees, pleading for peace.

This was granted, and the courteous and kind treatment they received from General Grant apparently won their hearts. If my memory is correct, the insurgents in General Grant's District (the Fifth) were the first to sue for peace, and as it was the most populous portion of Luzon, their example was soon followed by the rest.

The people returned to their homes, resuming their former conditions, activities, and vocations as best they could. The machinery of the new government under the new flag was put in motion and affairs in general began to assume a rapid return to normalcy.

The cabezas of the cities, towns, and villages in the Fifth District held a meeting, and as a result, an invitation was extended to General Grant and staff, including friends, to be their guests at Un Gran Fiesta de Paz (a grand feast of peace) to be held at Malolos. This affair lasted a week and was grand in every way. It would take a much abler pen than mine to do it justice. Malolos was decorated as never before. A number of bands provided music. Processions of various kinds, serious and comic, were held daily. There was a grand ball in Aguinaldo's former Congress Hall. And last but not least a six to eight course tiffin and dinner were served every noon and night during our entire visit.

I have been entertained in many countries, but have never seen anything that excelled — and but few that equaled — the lavish hospitality of the Filipinos.

With their primitive method of cooking, it was a mystery to us, especially to our ladies, how they ever prepared and served the most dainty and delicious dishes in such abundance, without delays or confusion.

Their stove was a simple platform of brick three feet high, six to eight feet square, covered with a shallow layer of sand, all under a large open chimney. Their cooking utensils were nothing but shallow clay bowls, similar to our old-fashioned 'wash-bowls,' and their fuel was charcoal. Their barefoot servants seemed to be trained with almost military precision and their service was faultless.

One evening, while we were at dinner, a charming young Spanish mestiza, seated opposite General Grant, arose, and with modest mien yet flashing eyes threw her very soul into a most thrilling and pathetic song. Her voice was most remarkable — a deep, rich, melodious contralto, one of the best I had ever heard. It seems the fiancé of the young beauty was a general in the insurrection, had been captured and was then an inmate of a military prison in the General's district. At the conclusion of her song she stepped around to General Grant, seized his hand, kissed it, and, falling to her knees, pathetically besought him to liberat  her lover.

The General, visibly embarrassed, arose, and lifting her to her feet, very gently and courteously explained how it was impossible to grant her petition.

This method of invoking clemency from high authority had its origin during the centuries of Spanish rule, the poor unselfish maid ready to sacrifice all to save some beloved one from punishment or death. But Uncle Sam's generals are different, she learned.

Her wonderful voice so impressed a wealthy American in our party that he made an effort to have her come to the United States with a chaperon and have her voice trained, all at his expense, but, although grateful for the offer, she refused to leave the vicinity of her beloved.

The educated Filipino women have many splendid traits and I saw many happy families in that country.

Another diplomatic and appropriate tribute to General Grant was an elaborate testimonial of their regard, respect, and admiration in the form of an exquisitely engrossed, rosetted and beribboned manuscript, from each community in his District, the total filling a good-sized trunk. A marvelous contrast, the above, with the day these same people denounced the Stars and Stripes. Even now, there are people who do not know when they are well off.

After peace came the disbanding of General Grant's famous Mounted Scouts commanded by First Lieutenant Frank S. Burr, Fifteenth United States Infantry, than which no more efficient organization served in the Philippines. A complete history of their activities during the two years of guerrilla war would be very interesting reading.

When the Scouts were assembled at headquarters for their farewell review, General Grant gave them a heart-to-heart talk, telling how much he appreciated their splendid work, and that he would be delighted to see them should fate ever throw them together after they returned home, a discourse that brought tears to the eyes of many a stalwart seasoned veteran. After shaking hands with each man as he passed by, the General presented him with one of those full-grown cigars, a souvenir from the new brand, some of which may still be unconsumed. There was no necessity of warranting that brand to last.

CHAPTER XXXIV

'THE BATTLE OF THE EGGS'

AUGUST 30, 1900, I was ordered on temporary duty to Dagupan as Chief Surgeon of the Third District, commanded by General Jacob H. Smith. Dagupan is a seaport on the west coast of Luzon and was then the terminus of the railway from Manila, and some distance north of Angeles.

The railroad was still torn up north of us and I traveled overland with an escort. The trip was uneventful except for a comical incident as I was crossing a large river in a canoe. In addition to the two native boatmen and myself there was in the craft a half-drunken soldier with a pretty little parrakeet attached to one of his thumbs by a cord. The soldier, returning home from a furlough, made strenuous efforts to conceal his condition from me, and of course the more he tried the more evident it became. When part way across he lost his balance and went overboard head first, nearly upsetting the craft.

The water was deep, the current swift, and the man could not swim, but the natives were very skillful and in a moment had swung around and we were beside him and I pulled him in. The bath had sobered him, but the poor little bird, his brilliant plumage drenched and bedraggled, after giving himself a good shake, turned loose with a string of Spanish profanity that was perfectly astounding. He must have been raised with a bull-whacker.

While at Dagupan I had another experience that was somewhat extraordinary as well as amusing. A part of my duties was the inspection of the garrisons, and as quite a number in General Smith's District lay along the west coast of Luzon, I had at my disposal the gunboat Samar, a small vessel belonging to the 'Mosquito Fleet,' a branch of the navy for coast service among the Islands. We had a crew of twenty-five or thirty men under the command of a young Ensign.

The Ensign regretted that, although he had been on duty in the Islands for about a year, he had never heard the whistle of a hostile bullet. I jokingly told him that I was very lucky in that way and as I was to be with him he would soon smell gunpowder.

The weather was perfect and we had a very pleasant voyage all along the coast. There was no wharf or dock at any of the landing-places above Subig Bay, so after anchoring the steamer out some distance I would be taken in a small boat to shallow water and carried to shore on the back of a native. As my weight was about two hundred and twenty-five pounds, how those little chaps lugged me in without giving me a ducking was a surprise to me.

We arrived at Subig Bay about September 21 and tied up at the dock, which is unique in that it was made by Nature, the water right up to the shore being deep enough for large ships. The small town there was called Olon-gapo.

In addition to weapons carried by the crew the Samar was armed by a machine gun at each end of the bridge and a six-pounder mounted on the deck at the stern. There was an awning over the deck, and as it was hot in the stateroom below I had been sleeping on deck on a cot but a few feet from the cannon.

The starboard side of the vessel paralleled the dock. Over the port side a dense forest could be seen skirting the edge of the bay just six hundred yards distant. With the foot of my cot toward the port side, I had retired and was almost asleep when like a thunderbolt from a clear sky a large force of insurgents in the edge of the forest across the bay opened up with volley after volley from their Mausers. The bullets sang through the air all about us and many struck the ship. In fact they seemed to have our range exactly. Raising myself on my elbow I had a perfect view of the scene. My first thought was, 'How this will gladden the heart of the Ensign!' That officer was already on the bridge, his voice vibrating with excitement as he shouted his orders.

Now came the gunner from below, and in bounding across the deck to his gun he failed to see me in the shadow of the awning. He tripped as he struck my cot amidships, falling headlong over it and partially upsetting me. I heard a groan and some emphatic, inarticulate muttering from him as he scrambled to his feet and jumped to his gun.

As my cot tipped, I involuntarily put out my hand as a brace and it landed on a very moist deck, my brain instantly registering blood.

In an instant — as it was already loaded — the cannon, paralleling my cot a few feet away, roared and shortly was fired again. In the mean time the machine gun on the bridge began its pur-rrrrrr, which was quickly echoed by the rifles of the crew, but all this, including the Ensign, was forgotten in my intense admiration for my hero at the six-pounder, evidently badly wounded and yet doing his duty nobly, as he was serving the cannon alone.

I even formulated in my mind a perfectly splendid report that I would make of his bravery and courage as exhibited in this exploit.

Unless some one was hit there was nothing for me to do, so I lay still through it all. But for the bullets I could easily imagine I was at some Fourth-of-July celebration, with the fireworks along the edge of the forest, the exhibition of activity on the Samar, the silvery waves of the bay between reflecting the brilliancy of the moon and stars above, all together presented a most beautiful and exciting panorama that I shall never forget. It would be difficult to imagine a more luxurious manner in which to participate in a war scene.

But the show was soon over. Our boys evidently had the range, for before a half-dozen shells — accompanied by a shower of bullets from the rifles of the Marines — had flown across the bay, the fireworks in the forest ceased almost as suddenly as they had begun.

Later it was learned the enemy had ten killed and about thirty wounded. In spite of the fact that hundreds of Mauser bullets came our way, not a man was hit.

The Ensign, happy and jubilant, came back to shake hands and put me on record as the mascot of the Samar. As we shook, I — for a joke — mournfully put out my left hand to show him my blood, but it was gone.

An official investigation was held on the spot and the mystery was solved. To keep them cool, the cook had put a big basket of eggs on the deck, between my cot and the gun, and my hero(?) had landed head first in it, a curious climax to his acrobatic performance. The sequel — no eggs for breakfast.

Who says I didn't have a hand in the first authentic case of 'shell-shock' in this world's history?

With the exception of the date, taken from my inspection records at Subig Post, the entire story of that 'shoot-up' of the Samar, I wrote from memory. Desiring the name of the officer in command, which I had forgotten, I had written a short time before to the Secretary of the Navy requesting it if possible, and also his status if still living. Not hearing from him, I proceeded to write the above as stated.

A short time afterward, the Pension Board at Long Beach, California, Drs. Charles S. Evans, George O. Gordon, and myself, examined one Harry Harvey, an ex-sergeant of the United States Marines, for pension.

He was decorated with a Congressional Medal of Honor, the greatest and most highly prized of the three decorations authorized by our Government for valor, bestowed only for some deed voluntarily performed outside the line of duty, without reference to rank. It took persistent questioning of this modest hero to bring out the explanation of the medal.

In February, 1900, he was on duty at Olongapo, Luzon, Philippine Islands, as sergeant in a company of Marines. During a raid General Grant captured a small insurgent gunboat, the Don Francisco, up the Benictican River, a tributary of Subig Bay. Being cunningly camouflaged with palm leaves and other foliage, a short distance away it was easily mistaken for an island. This boat was brought down near the river mouth, where it was guarded by twelve Marines in charge of Sergeant Harvey. 'They were all from Georgia and the greatest fighters I have ever seen,' said Harvey.

February 16, 1900, a scouting detachment of Marines from Olongapo proceeded up this river in a launch. When some distance above the Don Francisco, they came to a sharp bend in the river and had hardly entered it when they were shot up by a large force of insurgents concealed in the jungle on the left bank.

At this time Harvey and his crew were all in the river enjoying a swim. From the crashing of the rifles they instantly decided that the little party of Marines were outnumbered, so quickly clambered on board their little vessel, all eager to go to their assistance. The response to Harvey's call for volunteers was unanimous and, selecting seven, away they paddled in a small boat, armed to the teeth, but stark naked. Landing just before they reached the bend in the river, they tore through the jungle — a remarkable feat itself for a white man clad in his birthday uniform — and as they reached the bank of the river an exciting scene was before them.

The little boat of the Marines was beached on the opposite shore, Private Welch was dead, his body lying partly on shore and in the water, and just as Harvey's band hove in sight Corporal Wallace Sullivan, while fighting for his life in the boat, was shot through the brain and fell overboard, sinking to the bottom of the stream.

Instantly ordering his men to open up a barrage on the insurgents to keep down their fire as much as possible, and throwing down his gun and ammunition, Harvey leaped into the river, swam across, and, after diving the second time, found the body of Sullivan, returned with it and, after passing it up to two of his men, swam over the second time and brought back the body of Welch, all under a most galling fire. Although the bank on the insurgent side was only a foot or two above the water level, on Harvey's side it was about ten feet straight up and down.

Hurrah for the Marines!

We learned while examining Harvey for pension that he still carried some of the thorns he picked up in that wild dash through the jungle. Incidentally I asked Harvey if he had ever seen the Gunboat Samar while he was at Olongapo and to my surprise he told me the following: 'I remember the Samar very well. She arrived one afternoon in September, 1900, and finding an old friend aboard I was visiting with him until the wee small hours of the morning. Right in the midst of our yarns the ship was shot up in good shape, but strange to say not a man was hit. The only loss was a basket of eggs that the cook had put on deck to keep cool. They were sure scrambled raw by a gunner who, rushing from below to his gun, fell over a surgeon asleep on the deck, falling head first in the basket. The doctor got a liberal squirt of the juice and thinking the man mortally wounded did his best to have him go below and be attended to.'

Harvey's surprise at learning I was the surgeon on deck at the 'great little battle of the basket of eggs' — as he expressed it — was no less than mine at hearing him tell of it. He even remembered that the name of the officer in command was Day.

After examining Harvey, I returned to my office and found the following letter which had arrived during my absence:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION
WASHINGTON, D.C., 28 April, 1928

DEAR DOCTOR HOYT:

By a strange coincidence your letter addressed to the Secretary of the Navy was referred to me for preparation of the data desired therein.

Since I was one of the two officers attached to the gunboat Samar during the time referred to, I am taking the liberty to reply direct.

I remember very well the incident of the shooting up of the Samar by the insurgents, while lying alongside dock at the old Spanish Navy Yard at Olongapo, at about 3:00 A.M. of September 22, 1900. A battalion of Marines was stationed at Olongapo, and the gunboat Samar and the smaller gunboat Gardoqui were lying alongside dock. Lieutenant George C. Day, U.S.N., and you were sleeping on deck aft on army cots when the fire opened. Some of the crew rushed aft to man the six-pounder gun, and one of them stumbled over your cot and fell to the deck and into a basket of eggs. You awakened just as the man was falling and thought he had been hurt, and reaching out your hand to the deck and feeling the eggs running over the deck made sure that the man was seriously injured, and undertook to assist him below: in the language that followed I fear the man somewhat forgot the respect due an officer.

As stated, the Samar was commanded by Lieutenant George C. Day, who is now a Rear Admiral commanding the Light Cruiser Division 2 of the Scouting Fleet (U.S.S. Trenton Flag-ship), and I was a Naval Cadet and the only other officer attached to the ship. The total crew numbered thirty, and the armament consisted of one six-pounder, three three-pounders, and two one-pounders.

At present I am a Commander in the Naval Reserve on duty in the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department. If you should ever wander this way, I trust you will give me the pleasure of again recalling with you these interesting events.

Yours sincerely

J. A. SCHOFIELD
Comdr. U.S.N.R.

This belated memory test of three individuals, from different sections, after a lapse of twenty-eight years, is remarkable, so I have reproduced it egg'zactly as it occurred.

CHAPTER XXXV

BACK TO THE STATES AND PRIVATE LIFE

SEPTEMBER 1, 1901, I sailed from San Francisco, California, on the U.S. Transport Sheridan for Manila, accompanied by my wife and twelve-year-old son, intending to make the Islands my permanent home.

General Frederick D. Grant, also a passenger, had been visiting his daughter, Julia, the Princess Cantacuzene, at her home in Russia. As the General and I were the ranking officers on board, we occupied the two best state-rooms on the ship, side by side on the upper deck facing the bow.

Among the passengers were a Mr. A. W. Hastings and his daughter, Miss Charlotte, very agreeable, charming people from Minneapolis, both on their way to Manila, Miss Charlotte to meet and marry her fiancé, Judge Charles A. Willard, of the Supreme Court of the Philippine Islands.

During my two years at Angeles, among the occasional recreations of the headquarters mess was a modest game of draw poker in which both General Grant and I often joined.

Meeting me on deck one evening, he said that he and one of the officers were going to have a game in his cabin, and after giving me a cordial invitation to join them suggested that I bring Mr. Hastings, to whom he had taken quite a fancy.

I found Mr. Hastings quite willing, so we left our respective ladies, our itinerary unknown, and slipped into the General's cabin.

We were in the midst of the game when a sudden exclamation caused us to look up and in the two bull's-eyes overlooking the deck and open for ventilation were two faces, each registering astonishment verging on horror, one Mrs. Hoyt and the other Miss Charlotte, who, while taking their evening promenade and passing casually, glanced through the openings! Caught flagrante delicto.

During this voyage a remarkable coincidence occurred. With a favorable breeze a large sail would be hoisted to increase speed. One evening, just at sundown, the ropes supporting this sail became loosened and it had fallen part way down, its folds wrinkled and lying in such a way that, standing at a certain place on the deck, a large and perfect profile of President William McKinley could be seen silhouetted against the sky. Many of the passengers saw this and some noted it in their diaries.

Before we anchored in Manila Bay our ship was circled by a launch and we were megaphoned the news of the assassination of the President and its date was the same as that of the incident of the sail.

In due time General Grant was ordered to Nueva Caceres, Camarines Sur, P.I., to take command of the Fourth Separate Brigade, I accompanying him as Chief Surgeon.

General Grant established his headquarters in a fine commodious residence, formerly the home of a native planter. He had secured the services of two Japanese boys while in Manila, one an expert cook and the other his valet, who with a retinue of native servants to assist soon transformed the headquarters mess into a very delightful place to live. Peace was now established and as a number of the officers had been joined by their families, these, with a number of school-teachers, formed a very pleasant little social circle.

At this post my duties extended over the following: The provinces of Tayabas, Camarines Sur, Albay, and Sorsogon, and the adjacent islands of Catanduanes, Burias, Masbate, and Tiaco, with a total population of 654,186, and covering an area of 8229 square miles.

The roads were very poor and we relied chiefly upon water transportation, so we had no ambulances. There were several launches and one small vessel at our disposal.

As elsewhere mentioned, I have always been very fond of field sports, especially shooting. For a number of years before the Spanish-American War I was a neighbor and also family physician of Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, recently our distinguished Secretary of State, and as he too was a devotee of the rod and gun, many of my pleasantest recollections are of our hunting and fishing excursions together. He gave me a Greener shotgun, made to order in London to fit my shoulder. It was a twelve-gauge, double-barreled, and with an automatic ejector, a beautiful and most accurate weapon — and I may add, is still shooting strong, although with close to thirty-five years of service in the field. This gun was with me in the Philippines.

There was fine shooting in the vicinity of Nueva Caceres, all kinds of water fowl, as well as plenty of snipe, pigeon, quail — the latter a very diminutive bird compared with our 'bob white' — parrots, fruit bats, and jungle fowl. There were also monkeys if one cared to kill them, something I never could do.

There were numerous rice paddies still containing some water near Nueva Caceres where one could get a good bag of snipe or ducks at almost any time. General Grant was also fond of bird shooting, and as he had no shotgun I would loan him my Greener. He went out one day, forgetting his rubber boots, so instead of wading he walked about on the narrow tops of the dykes that surround the paddies. A fine flock of mallards came sailing over. He fired and missed and as he turned quickly to fire the second barrel, forgot where he was standing, and went headlong into the mud.

I wasn't there, but I heard several versions of his soothing remarks as he crawled out. I am not sure the mud is all out of that Greener yet, as he used its muzzle first to break his fall.

I had now been in the Philippines some years, was beginning to understand the people, enjoyed Oriental life, the climate suited me, and foreseeing the future possibilities in the Islands I had brought my family from the other side of the world with the idea of making a new home.

But that something which controls our destinies brought complete change to these plans. My wife, my son, and I were all injured in varying degrees in an accidental fire in our quarters. But for the prompt help of General Grant himself and his aide, Lieutenant Miller, we should all have perished. My own hurts included burns of the first degree on my hands and forearms, my wife sustained a severe injury, and my son was terribly burned. Realizing, before my own injuries were healed, that my boy would never recover in that climate, I wired my resignation to General Chaffee in Manila and requested passage home on the next transport.

Arriving in Manila I reported to General Chaffee, who for some time had absolutely turned down every request by an officer for a leave of absence.

After greetings, 'Why this resignation?' asked the stern-visaged old soldier.

'To save my son's life,' I replied.

'Why didn't you ask for leave?'

'Because I didn't think you'd grant it,' I said.

'Umph,' he grunted, and tearing up my resignation dictated an order for two-months' leave, which I still have among my treasured souvenirs.

HENRY F. HOYT
Major and Chief Surgeon, U.S.V.
1902

When several days out from Japan the good transport Meade ran into a typhoon that raged for more than a week, and it was then learned that a very inferior quality of coal had been palmed off on us by that noted group of native beauties at Nagasaki. Their method of coaling ship is by passing it up in an endless chain of baskets, the maidens standing on a series of gradually elevated platforms from the bottom of the coal barge to the opening in the side of the ship far above. This is one of the sights one looks forward to on a tour of the world. There is nothing just like it elsewhere.

The ship's officers evidently had their weather eye on beauties instead of baskets. The price and quantity of the coal was all right, but the quality dropped off about fifty per cent as it was converted into steam.

This discovery compelled a change in our course and the ship was re-coaled at Honolulu, a side-step that no one objected to. Two days were very pleasantly spent there, the outstanding diversions being a swim at Waikiki Beach and a visit to the Museum where numerous curious relics of early Hawaiian history are seen.

In the evening we were entertained at a ball in the Hawaiian Hotel, the music for which being furnished by the famous Royal Hawaiian Band. They were the first band I had ever heard sing as they played for the dance, and it was certainly thrilling. I might also add, and not very difficult to dance to.

On arriving at San Francisco, I found that although my boy was much better he was far from well, so again I wired my resignation, this time to the Secretary of War direct. This was in March, 1902, and my reply was an order to report for temporary duty at Fort Douglas, Salt Lake City, Utah, where I was honorably discharged October 10, 1902, and returned to private life. I learned after my long tour in hot countries that I could not live in a cold climate, and after visiting our Eastern cities and making a tour through Old Mexico I again took up the practice of my profession at El Paso, Texas, later settling in Long Beach, California, the queen of the beach cities in this State, which has now been my home for nearly twenty years, and where any of the old-timers I have ever known are welcome. There are only a few of us left.

THE END

1.Ea.723.

A frontier doctor, 1929

Countway Library

BFN8828

3 2044 046 313 813

1.Ea.723.

A frontier doctor, 1929

Countway Library

BFN8828

3 2044 046 313 813